Absence of statute

Judicial notice will be taken of the fact that there is no public act creating a particular corporation.—Hurlburt v. Britain, 2 Dougl., Mich., 191.

Amendments

Statute providing that acts of incorporation are public acts of which courts will take notice without allegation or proof applies equally to amendments of acts of incorporation.—Bleck v. East Boston Co., 18 N.E.2d 536, 302 Mass. 127.

Passage of act

Judicial notice has been taken that both branches of the legislature recently passed a new corporation act, vitally changing the essential principles of existing law, even though the act, at the time of the decision, had not been approved by the governor.—Stanton v. State Tax Commission of Ohio, 159 N.E. 340, 26 Ohio App. 198, affirmed State v. Zangerle, 159 N.E. 823, 117 Ohio St. 436.

matters of fact relating to corporations or associations not deducible from the face of any statutory provision, or of common knowledge, especially the affairs of a particular corporation or association.[28] As a rule, courts do not notice without proof the fact of acceptance of a charter or the organization of a domestic corporation under a general law,[29] or under which one of several laws it was organized,[30] whether it had adopted the provisions of some other act,[31] or that a corporation has taken certain action with respect to property or otherwise;[32] nor will the courts notice the by-laws of a private corporation,[33] or the existence, powers, or duties of officers of a corporation,[34] unless such facts are matters of public law[35] or of common knowledge.[36] Courts do not judicially notice the seals of private corporations or associations, but they must be proved.[37]

Corporation sale. The existence of a corporation sale being shown, the courts take judicial notice that the office has civil rights and duties, but courts do not take judicial notice of the nature and scope of such civil rights and duties.[38]

Foreign corporations. In accordance with the general rule as to judicial notice of the law of another forum, see supra §§ 18–21, courts, as a general rule, do not take judicial notice of either the public or private statutes of another jurisdiction, whether of a sister state or territory[39] or of a foreign country,[40] which relate to corporations; and judicial notice will not be taken of facts relating to foreign corporations which are not matters of common knowledge or otherwise entitled to judicial notice under the application of general principles relating to such notice.[41] Accordingly, in the absence of circumstances otherwise entitling it to judicial notice, the courts cannot take judicial notice of the appointment by a foreign corporation of an agent to receive and acknowledge service of process.[42] On the other hand, it has also been held that the fact that a foreign corporation is licensed to do business in the state and that it maintains general offices within the state, may be judicially noticed,[43] and the fact that a corporation is doing business within the jurisdiction may be noticed.[44] Of course, facts of common knowledge relating to

Compliance with law
(1) The supreme court would not take judicial notice that a foreign corporation did not comply with the law authorizing it to do business in the state.—Pekin Cooperage Co. v. State ex rel. Pike County, 122 S.W. 2d 468, 197 Ark 341.

(2) However, it has also been held that the presumption is that secretary of state has done his duty in preparing lists of foreign corporations qualified to do business in state, as required by Acts 1919 c 184, and court will judicially notice absence of name of corporation from such lists, and presume corporation unqualified.—National Plastic Relief Co. v. Signal Amusement Co., 269 S.W. 40, 151 Tenn. 235.

foreign corporations may be judicially noticed.[45]

Religious and charitable institutions. Courts will take judicial notice of religious corporations created by public law.[46] The court may take judicial notice that in the prominent cities of our states there are numerous organized charities that are not incorporated as well as those that are incorporated.[47] Judicial notice may be taken of the fact that most religious institutions are of a charitable nature.[48] Judicial notice is not taken of the existence or nonexistence of local religious societies;[49] and where the statutes of the state authorize the formation of corporations for religious and other purposes the court does not judicially know that a certain corporation is a religious corporation.[50] In the application of general rules as to the taking of judicial notice, the courts have taken, or declined to take, judicial notice of particular facts relating to particular religious or charitable organizations.[51] Judicial notice of religious matters generally will be discussed in detail in § 93 infra.

Reports of corporations. In some states by force of certain statutes reports by railroad companies to a state board or commission may be noticed judicially.[52]

Federal matters. The federal courts, including the supreme court of the United States, judicially know the existence, name, and powers of a corporation created by an act of congress,[53] and the powers or privileges conferred by act of congress on a state corporation.[54] Likewise, state courts have taken judicial notice of federal corporations.[55] A

45. Fact of foreign charters

It is a matter of common knowledge that a great number of corporations, essentially local in the scope of their activities, conduct business under charters granted by foreign jurisdictions.—Levy v. Pacific Eastern Corporation, 275 N.Y.S. 291, 153 Misc. 488.

(1) Judicial notice has been taken of the masonic order.—Most Worshipful Prince Hall Grand Lodge, F. & A. M. of Colorado and Jurisdiction, v. Most Worshipful Hiram Grand Lodge, F. & A. A. Y. M. of Colorado and Jurisdiction, National Compact Prince Hall Origin, 273 P. 648, 85 Colo. 17.

(2) Both on the grounds of common knowledge and of provisions contained in the acts of incorporation, the courts have taken judicial notice that the society of free masons is a purely charitable corporation.—Burdine v. Grand Lodge, 37 Ala. 478.

(3) Judicial notice, however, will not be taken that particular masonic lodges outside the state are charitable institutions.—In re Wirt's Estate, 277 P. 118, 207 Cal. 106.

(4) Facts relating to the Masonic order which are not matters of common knowledge will not be judicially noticed.

M. of Colorado and Jurisdiction v. Most Worshipful Hiram Grand Lodge, F. & A. A. Y. M. of Colorado and Jurisdiction, National Compact Prince Hall Origin, 273 P. 648, 652, 85 Colo. 17.

Odd Fellows

Judicial notice may be taken that more than one order of Odd Fellows exists in the state, where such is the case.—Ford v. Grand United Order of Odd Fellows of State of Texas, Tex.Civ.App., 50 S.W.2d 856, error dismissed.

Red Cross

Judicial notice may be taken of the fact that the American National Red Cross is a corporation, and of its organization, its activities, and authority to receive gifts.

Alaska.—In re Lanart's Estate, 9 Alaska 535.

Ind.—American Nat. Red Cross v. Felzner Post, 159 N.E. 771, 86 Ind. App. 709.

While the court may know historically that the association originally founded under the name of Young Men's Christian Association was essentially charitable, it cannot know judicially that the many independent organizations now existing under the same name are so, especially where the laws of the state permit incorporation for business as well as for charitable purposes, and the character of a particular corporation depends on its articles of incorporation.—Susman v. Young Men's Christian Assoc., 172 P. 554, 101 Wash. 487.

(2) That National Farm Loan associations, organized under the Federal Farm Loan Act, have a separate corporate entity from federal land banks.—Hinds v. Federal Land Bank of New Orleans, 179 So. 194, 235 Ala. 360.

state court will take judicial notice of general laws relative to the incorporation of national banks;[56] and federal courts have taken judicial notice of the existence of all national banks without proof of organization under the National Bank Act.[57]

§ 92. Consolidation or Cessation

Judicial notice will not be taken of the consolidation or cessation of corporations unless it is a matter so declared by a public statute or a matter of common knowledge.

The courts take judicial notice of the legal consequences of consolidation of domestic corporations,[58] but not that corporations have consolidated under a statute authorizing them to do so,[59] or of a foreign law authorizing consolidation,[60] or of the legal consequences of a consolidation of foreign corporations.[61] Judicial cognizance is not taken that one corporation is the successor of another,[62] unless made so by legislation.[63] Where congress, the creating power of the corporation, and the supreme court of the United States have both recognized one corporation as the successor of another, state courts will take judicial notice of such fact.[64] While the expiration of a charter has been judicially noticed,[65] the courts do not take judicial notice that the existence of a corporation whose charter has not expired by limitation has ceased.[66]

§ 93. Religious Matters

General religious matters may be judicially noticed.

Judicial notice may be taken of general religious matters which are of common knowledge,[67] but courts will not take cognizance of religious matters which are purely ecclesiastical,[68] or which are not matters of common knowledge.[69] Accordingly, judicial notice may be taken of the various religious denominations,[70] and, according to the de-

99. Effect of removing

It is a matter of common knowledge that letting down property restrictions for one lot owner will eventually deprive all coöwners of the benefits of restrictive covenants.—Continental Oil Co. v. Fennemore, 299 P. 132, 38 Ariz. 277.

Residential districts

The court will take judicial notice that many families desire to own homes for residence purposes which shall be distinct and separate from residences occupied by other families, and that there is a strong and growing tendency everywhere to set aside special districts to be used exclusively for such purposes.—Ainsworth v. Elder, 9 P.2d 1007, 40 Ariz. 71.

1. Incident to city life

It is a matter of common knowledge that houses are built close together in cities, and that slight interference with the air entering a building is merely an incident to city life.—Lincoln v. McGehee Hotel Co., 29 S.W.2d 668, 181 Ark. 1117.

Commercial activity

On application for permit for operation of airport by University of Virginia, the state corporation commission will take judicial notice that university conducts incidental enterprises of a commercial nature without involving university in commer-

by institutions of higher learning,[15] and the advantage of housing students near a university.[16] Judicial notice is also taken of the statutes of the state relating to public schools.[17] Facts of common knowledge relating to school teachers, principals, and superintendents are also judicially noticed.[18]

§ 97. Statistics

Common statistical knowledge is a proper subject of judicial notice.

Judicial notice may be taken of that which is common statistical knowledge.[19] Accordingly, judicial notice may be taken of the birth statistics published by the department of commerce.[20]

Judicial notice of the laws of mathematics is discussed in § 74 supra.

§ 98. Census

Judicial notice may be taken of a federal or state census and of facts established thereby.

Courts know the facts generally known to have been established by statistics in much the same way and for much the same reason that they know the facts set forth in the almanac. The court cannot verify the facts; but, where statistics are official, prepared by public officers acting under provision of law, the duty of the court to know the law and recognize the existence of acts done under it stimulates and indorses the court's knowledge of the facts established by such statistics, in which the community shares. Courts, therefore, will take judicial knowledge of the results of a census taken under federal[21] or state[22] authority. The court will take the statute can apply to only one county[31] or particular counties,[32] or to one city,[33] in the state. Other facts of general interest obtained from the official census will be noticed,[34] such as the fact that the majority of the state population is urban,[35] and that a particular county is sparsely settled.[36] Courts, however, will not take judicial notice of the population of a school district,[37] sanitary district,[38] or other subdivision or district not shown by any official census.[39] A legally unofficial estimate of population, although made by a public body, will not be judicially accepted as determinative.[40] A mere colorable proceeding on the part of the legislative body of a city without any substantial compliance with the law, as to the taking of such census, would not impart any notice of the number of the inhabitants of the city;[41] but, where the statute is general in its terms and quite indefinite as to the character of the census to be taken or the method to be pursued in the taking thereof, a substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient to authorize the court to recognize the census taken as official and to take judicial notice of the population of the city as shown thereby, even though some of the proceedings connected with the taking and showing of the result of the census are quite informal.[42]

Estimate of population with census as factor. As a fact of common knowledge, increase in population subsequent to the last official census may be judicially noticed.[43] Under the general rule that the preceding, as well as the last, official census may be judicially noticed, judicial cognizance may be taken of the rate of increase shown by each successive census,[44] and a broad conclusion as to the probable rate of increase in the immediate future may be legitimate,[45] unless the case is one in which absolute certainty is required.[46] It is doubtful if there is any judicially recognized ratio whereby a closely approximate estimate of population can be made by comparison of the number of votes cast at a general state or county election, or of the number of school children shown by a census, with a preceding official census of population;[47] but common knowledge of the population of the state may enable a court to know judicially that there are not a specified number of electors in the state.[48]

healthy persons[50] in employments not extrahazardous.[51] While there is some variance in the different tables, yet the courts know that an equal or even greater difference in expectation of life may arise from other causes.[52] A person's probable earnings during his period of life expectancy cannot be judicially known.[53]

Annuity tables. Judicial notice may be taken of annuity tables.[54]

§ 100. Time, Days, and Dates

Judicial notice may be taken of facts disclosed by the almanac and calendar relating to time, days, and dates.

Courts will judicially notice the things properly belonging to an almanac.[55] The courts take judicial notice of the calendar[56] and of the periods within the calendar.[57] They take judicial notice of the computation of time,[58] the subdivision of the year into months, weeks, and days,[59] the days of the week,[60] the order of succeeding days of the week,[61] the number of days in a month,[62] the coincidence of days of the week with days of the month,[63] and of the days of the month with those of the year.[64] Likewise, courts judicially notice such fixed single standard was found to be not only beneficial but necessary in the operation of railroads and other means of transportation and in conducting business, government and private, and social affairs,[79] are so generally known that the courts may and should take judicial knowledge of them. The difference between actual or sun time and standard or railroad time is a matter of common knowledge of which the courts take judicial notice.[80] It has been held that a court will not take judicial notice of what system of time prevails and is in general use in a particular city or community outside of the jurisdiction in which it is sitting.[81]

§ 101. Values

Although judicial notice will be taken of matters of common knowledge relating to the values of property, courts do not assume to know the exact value of specific property.

Courts do not usually assume to know the value of particular articles or other pieces of property.[82] Facts of common knowledge, however, relating to values generally may be judicially noticed.[83] Thus the courts have in some cases taken judicial notice that a pecuniary consideration recited in a deed was merely nominal,[1] while in other cases they have declined to take judicial notice that the recited consideration was inadequate.[2] Although the court may take judicial notice that there has been a depreciation in the value of property generally throughout the state during a given period of time, it cannot know the extent of such depreciation.[3]

Cotton. The court will take judicial notice of what is common knowledge among the cotton trade relating to cotton,[4] such as that cotton is a world staple and that its price is approximately fixed everywhere by the daily market quotations furnished by the cotton exchanges in the world's great markets,[5] that the daily price of cotton fluctuates,[6] that the staple is bought and sold at prices minutely graduated according to its classified quality as fixed by world-wide standards,[7] that there is for every day in the year a specific and ascertainable market price for each of the designated grades,[8] and that the slight variations in price for different localities are founded on the varying cost of transportation to the centers of consumption and distribution.[9] On the other hand, judicial notice will not be taken of facts relating to the value of cotton, which are not matters of common knowledge.[10]

Wheat. As a general rule judicial notice will not be taken of the market price of wheat at any particular date,[11] but facts of common knowledge relating to the value of wheat will be judicially noticed.[12] It is a matter of judicial knowledge that the market price of the different standard grades of wheat bear a direct, although perhaps a varying, relation to each other,[13] and that the market price of sack wheat, including, as it does, the labor of sacking and the cost of the sacks, is higher than that of bulk wheat.[14]

Of circulating medium. Courts recognize the value of the circulating medium,[15] the premium on gold coin,[16] and, with some exceptions,[17] the equivalents in currency of the United States of current coin of other countries.[18] The Philippine courts do not take judicial notice of the difference between the values of Philippine and Mexican pesos.[19] The value of bank note currency at different times is not judicially noticed;[20] but the fact that there was some depreciation in value in a particular state the court may judicially notice as an historical fact.[21]

Of services. The reasonable value of services in a particular case will not be judicially noticed where it is not a matter of such common knowledge as to dispense with testimony on the subject.[22] Matters of common knowledge relating to the value of services, however, may be judicially noticed.[23]

Some courts take the view that the compensation which the professional services of the bar command is a matter of which the court must be presumed to have some knowledge, and that such knowledge cannot with propriety be wholly ignored in passing on controversies involving the value of such services and in determining their reasonable value,[24] especially where the services are rendered in the jurisdiction of the court and to a greater or less extent in its presence.[25] Other courts adopt the rule that the reasonable value of an attorney's services is not a subject of judicial notice.[26] A judge is not at liberty to use as judicial knowledge his personal knowledge that certain attorney's fees charged are higher than customary for like services, against the uncontradicted evidence that such fees are reasonable.[27] Judicial notice may be taken of the various elements entering into a determination of the reasonable value of an attorney's services.[28]

Judicial notice may be taken of the fact that the charge for a surgical operation is not according to any fixed rule.[29] The courts have no judicial knowledge of the value of a physician's services under given circumstances.[30]

Rates of interest. The current rates of interest on moneyed securities is a matter of common knowledge and public history of which the courts will take judicial notice.[31] When such is the case, courts will take judicial notice of a decline in the general interest rates, and one court has taken notice of the amount of the decline,[32] although another court has refused to do so.[33] The rate of interest which government securities bear has been judicially noticed.[34] The court can take judicial notice of the present condition of the financial market,[35] and the fact that interest rates at the present time are low will be judicially noticed.[36]

Difficulty to secure earnings

In determining whether the five per cent rate of return allowed gas company by commerce commission was confiscatory, the court would take judicial notice of fact that it would be difficult to invest a sum comparable to the value of gas company's property, so as to earn five per cent.—Peoples Gas Light & Coke Co. v. Slattery, 25 N.E.2d 482, 373 Ill. 31, appeal dismissed Peoples Gas & Coke Co. v. Hart, 60 S.Ct. 724, 309 U.S. 634, 84 L.Ed. 991.

Factors influencing rate

(1) It is common knowledge that rate exacted for money increases as value of security offered lessens, and that brokers, and frequently lenders themselves, demand commissions, which demands at times are influenced by exigencies and necessities of borrower.—Ryan v. Austin, Iowa, 202 N.W. 562.

(2) It is common knowledge that interest rate on loans varies according to circumstances.—Lee v. Beauchamp, 300 S.W. 401, 175 Ark. 716.

Courts, in administration of trust fund, will take judicial notice of fund's income yielding quality.—In re Archambault's Estate, 162 A. 801, 308 Pa. 549.

Small loans

It is a matter of common knowledge that persons who have no banking credit and require small loans to pay debts, meet taxes, or provide funds for emergency needs have always found difficulty in obtaining money unless they paid a very high rate of interest, amounting in many cases to oppression.—Ex parte Fuller, 102 P.2d 321, 15 Cal.2d 425.

weights not thus fixed or familiarly known,[39] or uniform,[40] and measures not standard or commonly known,[41] are not judicially noticed. While the court may not judicially know the exact maximum and minimum weight of a certain matter, yet it may know that such matter necessarily has a maximum and minimum weight.[42] Facts of common knowledge will be judicially noticed in determining the reasonableness of statutes providing for a standardization of containers.[43]

The science of mensuration is a branch of pure mathematics with which the court is presumed to be acquainted.[44] The quantity of land in a league is judicially known,[45] and other obvious and easily ascertainable facts about the area of land may be judicially noticed;[46] but it has been held that judicial notice will not be taken of the exact area of land within given metes and bounds.[47] It is a matter of common knowledge that it is very difficult to estimate the area of unfenced fields,[48] especially where they are of irregular shape and surrounded by brush preventing a view from one field to another.[49] It is of common knowledge that distances are frequently measured by pacing or stepping and assuming a pace or step to be three feet.[50]

Units of distance. Matters of common knowledge relating to units of distance will be judicially noticed.[51]

III. BURDEN OF PROOF

§ 103. Definitions and Distinctions

The phrase "burden of proof," as used by the courts, is ambiguous; it is used indiscriminately as meaning either the necessity of establishing a fact or the necessity of making or meeting a prima facie showing.

The phrase "burden of proof," as used by the courts, is one of double meaning,[52] which circumstance has been the cause of confusion[53] so great as to suggest the propriety of adopting a less objectionable term.[54] The ambiguity lies in the indiscriminate use of the phrase "burden of proof," as meaning either the necessity of establishing the existence of a certain fact or set of facts by evidence which preponderates to a legally required extent,[55] or the necessity which rests on a party at any particular time during a trial to create a prima facie case in his own favor or to overthrow one when created against him.[56] To avoid confusion, the phrase "burden of proof" will, in this article, be confined to the necessity of finally establishing a fact, since that is held to be the primary or more appropriate meaning of the phrase;[57] the other meaning of burden of proof will be represented by the phrase "burden of evidence." Thus, the burden of proof and the burden of evidence are not the same thing;[58] the burden of evidence may be defined as the burden of making or meeting a prima facie showing as to an issue.[59]

The effect of evidence is to be distinguished from the burden of proof.[60]

§ 104. Burden of Proof Properly So-Called

a. In general
b. Application of general rule

a. In General

The burden of proof as to a fact or issue generally rests on the party asserting or pleading it, or having the affirmative of the issue, and remains on that party throughout the trial.

The rules as to the burden of proof are important and indispensable in the administration of justice,[61] and constitute a substantial right of the party on

Whether plaintiff or defendant

Party substantially asserting affirmative of issue, whether he be nominally plaintiff or defendant, has burden of proof.—Wilson v. Inter-Ocean Casualty Co., 188 S.E. 102, 210 N.C. 585.

Burden of proof always rests on actor, and never on the reus.—Hunt v. Eure, 127 S.E. 593, 189 N.C. 482.

Where cause of action is prosecuted against two or more, if the burden of proof is on plaintiff as to either of them, the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, has the right to give plaintiff the burden of proof on the whole case jointly.—New Ellerslie Fishing Club v. Stewart, 93 S.W. 598, 123 Ky. 8, 29 Ky.L. 414, 9 L.R.A.,N.S., 475.

Burden of explaining memorandum

The burden is on the offerer of a document called for to explain a memorandum by third parties appearing thereon, if it improperly appears there.—Stucker v. Shumaker, 139 A. 114, 290 Pa. 348.

65. U.S.—Reliance Life Ins. Co. v. Burgess, C.C.A.Mo., 112 F.2d 234, certiorari denied Burgess v. Reliance Life Ins. Co., 61 S.Ct. 137, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 391.

there are no pleadings, by the nature of the investigation;[66] so, the party asserting or pleading a fact or issue generally has the burden of proof as to such fact or issue.[67] This rule is founded on the obvious purpose of facilitating justice by serving the convenience of the court.[68] The test for determining which party has the affirmative, and therefore the burden of establishing a case, is found in the result of an inquiry as to which party would be successful if no evidence at all were given, the burden being, of course, on the adverse party.[69]

The burden of proof exists only in connection with an issue of fact.[70]

Negative allegation

(1) Whether allegation is negative or affirmative is material in determining where burden of proof should be placed.—Glou v. Security Ben. Ass'n, 173 A. 883, 114 Pa.Super. 139.

(2) However, negative character of allegation will not necessarily relieve party of burden.—Kuchan v. Strong, 46 P.2d 55, 39 N.M. 281.

Burden of proof is not changed by mispleading unless misleading to adverse party.—Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. M. Levy & Sons, 106 So. 525, 141 Miss. 199—22 C.J. p 69 note 44 [a].

Effect of admission

Rule that burden of proof is determined from an examination of the pleadings cannot be changed even by admission on trial of all material allegations of complaint or petition which plaintiff or petitioner would be required in first instance to prove.—In re Carpenter's Will, 12 N.Y.S.2d 724, 171 Misc. 363.

of the common law has the burden of proof;[71] and one who relies on an exception to a general rule has the burden of proving that the case falls within the exception,[72] unless the nonexistence of the exception is made a condition of the application of the rule.[73]

That a matter lies peculiarly within the knowledge of a party will be considered in determining the burden of proof as to such matter.[74]

The burden of proof, properly so called, does not shift; it rests throughout the case, as to each issue, on the party originally having the burden as to such issue,[75] notwithstanding the fact that the case is one in which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur may be applied.[76]

Difficulty of proof. A party is not relieved of the burden of proof by the difficulty or inconvenience of satisfying it.[77]

Where a party erroneously assumes the burden of proof as to a particular allegation or the burden of evidence as to a particular fact, the mistake will not be corrected in an appellate court.[78]

Proof by either party. The burden of proof is satisfied by actual proof of the facts of which proof is necessary, regardless of which party introduces the evidence.[79]

When case closed and submitted. When the evidence is all in and the case is submitted for determination, there can obviously no longer be any question as to the burden of proof, so far as that term is concerned with the order of production of evidence;[80] but at this stage the questions arising from the rule as to the burden of proof in its true sense and the obligation of a party to make out his case by the required quantum of evidence become of the utmost importance, and must be considered by court or jury in arriving at a determination.[81]

b. Application of General Rule

Plaintiff has the burden of proof as to the elements of his cause of action, and defendant has the burden of establishing special or affirmative defenses and cross claims.

In accordance with the general rule, stated in subdivision a supra, that a party has the burden of proof as to those issues as to which he has the affirmative, plaintiff has the burden of proof as to

Burden limited to special defense

The statute providing for a rule on defendant to plead specially does not cast the burden of proof generally on defendant, and filing of special plea does not change the burden of proof nor justify plaintiff in holding back proof in chief until after defendant has offered proof on special plea.—Hansard v. ment,[94] set-off,[95] or reconventional demand,[96] the burden is on him to establish every element of the claim. Plaintiff has the burden of proof as to an affirmative defense to such a claim.[97]

In cases of intervention by one who asserts a right of claim adverse to both parties to an action, the burden of proof rests on the intervener to establish his claim,[98] but the burden resting on the party to the main action who has the affirmative of the issue to establish his contention as against the other party is not affected.[99]

§ 105. Negative Allegations

The burden of proof as to a negative proposition rests on the party asserting it, except, under some authorities, where the facts are peculiarly within the adverse party's knowledge.

Whenever the establishment of an affirmative case requires proof of a material negative allegation, such as that the case does not come within an exception provided for, the party who makes such allegation has the burden of proving it,[1] except, according to some authorities, where the facts are peculiarly within the adverse party's knowledge;[2]

Establishing affirmative opposite

Where the most appropriate mode of proof is by establishing the affirmative opposite of the allegation, the text rule is especially applicable.

but the asserted exception as to negative allegations peculiarly within the adverse party's knowledge is said to relate to the burden of evidence and does not affect the burden of proof properly so called.[3]

Allegations not part of case. A party is not required to prove negative allegations which are merely necessary as pleadings but constitute no part of his case.[4]

§ 106. Under Common-Law Pleading

Under common-law pleading, the burden of proof as to any issue is on the party holding the affirmative thereof; so, if defendant denies an allegation material to plaintiff's case, plaintiff has the burden of establishing it; and a defendant relying on an affirmative defense which plaintiff denies has the burden of proving every material allegation relied on by him.

Under the common-law system of pleading, the burden of proof as to any issue is on the party holding the affirmative of the issue to establish the substance of his contention by the required preponderance of evidence;[5] but not necessarily to explain or disprove the allegations of his opponent.[6] It follows that, where a defendant denies an allegation material to plaintiff's case, the burden is on plaintiff to establish its truth,[7] whether the action is in contract[8] or in tort.[9] Should defendant not traverse, generally or specifically, the allegations of plaintiff's case, but rely on an affirmative defense,[10] as in abatement,[11] or confession and avoidance,[12] which plaintiff denies, the burden of proof is on defendant to prove every material allegation relied on by him, although the replication itself is argumentative,[13] or the declaration negatives the defense by anticipation.[14] Where a replication does not traverse or deny defendant's affirmative defense, but confesses and seeks to avoid it by setting up new facts which are themselves denied, the burden of proof is on plaintiff.[15] If a rejoinder is not a traverse, but a plea in confession and avoidance, the burden is on defendant to prove such new matter, and it is not incumbent on plaintiff to produce evidence in support of his replication.[16] If plaintiff does not take issue with a rejoinder, but pleads specially by rebutter, plaintiff has the burden of proving the rebutter, while defendant is relieved of proving the rejoinder.[17]

§ 107. Under Equity Pleading

In equity, the party having the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proof as to such issue.

In equity, as at law, the party who has the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proof as to such issue,[18] and a plaintiff in equity has the burden of proving all allegations of his bill not admitted by the answer.[19] Where defendant pleads an affirmative defense or sets up in his answer facts in avoidance, the burden of proof is on him.[20]

§ 108. Under Statutory Pleading

Under code practice the burden of proof as to any issue is on the party having the affirmative thereof; plaintiff has the burden of establishing allegations in the statement of his claim which are not admitted.

Under code practice, the burden of proof as to any issue is on the party having the affirmative of the issue.[21] The burden of proof is on plaintiff to establish allegations in the statement of his claim which are not admitted,[22] even though defendant's denial is argumentative,[23] or is accompanied by a plea qualifying the denial, but not admitting the truth of the allegation.[24] Defendant may, instead of making a distinct affirmative plea, state in his answer a sufficient number of express admissions to establish plaintiff's prima facie case and so transfer the burden of proof to himself,[25] and he has the burden of proving new matter set up in his answer,[26] even where no reply is allowed;[27] but the burden on plaintiff of proving alleged facts essential to his cause of action, cast on him by a general denial, is not removed by an allegation of those facts on information and belief in a verified plea setting up an affirmative defense.[28]

§ 109. In Special Judicial Proceedings

In special judicial proceedings, the burden of proof is on the party seeking affirmative relief.

In special judicial proceedings, the rule is that he who seeks affirmative relief has the burden of convincing the court that action should be taken in his favor.[29]

§ 110. Burden of Evidence

The burden of evidence at any particular time rests on the party who would be defeated if no further evidence were introduced; when a prima facie case is established, the burden of evidence is shifted to the adverse party, and the burden may shift from side to side during the course of the trial.

The burden of evidence, defined in § 103 supra, sometimes termed the burden of producing, or going forward with, the evidence,[30] or the burden of procedure,[31] shifts, or may shift, from side to side during the progress of the trial.[32] Its position at any particular time is controlled by the logical necessities of making proof which a party is under at the time, the burden being always on that party against whom the decision of the tribunal would be given if no further evidence were introduced.[33] It results from this that at the beginning of every trial the burden of proof and the burden of evidence as to any particular issue are generally on the same party.[34] This burden of evidence is so continued until the party having the burden of proof establishes a prima facie case;[35] nothing less will shift the burden of evidence.[36] When such a prima facie case is established, the burden of evidence is shifted to the adverse party;[37] the adverse party may, by the production of evidence destroying the prima facie case against him, satisfy the burden and restore it to the original party.[38] This process continues until the stock of relevant facts is exhausted.[39]

In determining whether the burden has shifted, the court may consider which party has in his control the more evidence.[40]

The burden of evidence as to any particular fact rests, generally speaking, on the party to whose case the fact is material.[41]

§ 111. Effect of Presumptions and Other Substitutes for Evidence

A presumption or other substitute for evidence shifts the burden of evidence, but not the burden of proof.

While it is often loosely said that a presumption shifts the burden of proof,[42] cases distinguishing between the concepts of burden of proof, properly so called, and burden of evidence, or using the phrases in their precise meanings, hold that the position of the burden of proof, properly so called, is not affected by a presumption,[43] but that a presumption shifts the burden of evidence.[44]

A presumption may establish a prima facie case and sustain the burden of evidence as to the issue it covers.[45] The same result may be effected by any substitute for evidence, such as judicial admissions,[46] rules of substantive law,[47] the rule res ipsa loquitur,[48] and statutory regulations prescribing what shall constitute prima facie evidence of specified facts.[49]

On the position of the burden of proof, properly so called, the existence of any particular inference of fact can have no effect, even should it constitute a prima facie case,[50] or should further proof be excused by a rule of law.[51]

§ 112. Proof of Negative Facts

The party asserting a negative has the burden of evidence as to such matter.

The party whose contention requires proof of a negative fact has the burden of evidence to prove that fact,[52] except as the rule may be modified by the fact, discussed infra § 113, that the evidence as to such issue is peculiarly within the adverse party's knowledge or control.

In deciding, however, what quantum of evidence shall be deemed sufficient, the practical limitations on proof imposed by the nature of the subject matter or the relative situation of the parties will be considered.[53] The court will more promptly discharge a litigant from the burden of evidence where the proposition is a negative one;[54] and the burden of evidence is sustained by proof which renders probable the existence of the negative fact,[55] circumstantial evidence being sufficient,[56] and nothing in the nature of a demonstration being required.[57]

§ 113. Effect of Peculiar Knowledge or Control of Evidence

The burden of evidence may be imposed on the party best able to sustain it; so the party having peculiar knowledge of facts, or control of evidence, relating to an issue may have the burden of evidence as to it, particularly in the case of a negative averment.

In the administration of justice it is desirable that the burden of producing evidence be placed on the party best able to sustain it,[58] and there is authority for the view that the burden of evidence as to an issue rests on the party having the greater means of knowledge.[59] A narrower formulation is that where the evidence as to an issue is peculiarly within the knowledge or control of a party, the burden of evidence as to such issue rests on him.[60] It is very generally held that, where the party who has not the general burden of proof possesses positive and complete knowledge concerning the existence of facts which the party having that burden is called on to negative, or has peculiar knowledge or control of evidence as to such matters, the burden rests on him to produce the evidence,[61] the

Dependence on circumstances
Whether burden to prove negative averment lies on plaintiff or defendant depends on circumstances of case; burden to prove negative averment in bill is on plaintiff, where it is as easy for latter to prove averment as for defendant to disprove it.—Hooper v. Talbot, 175 N.E. 783, 343 Ill. 590.

negative averment being taken as true unless disproved by the party having such knowledge or control.[62] The party on whom the burden is put by his peculiar knowledge or control is obliged to go no further than necessity requires.[63]

However, mere difficulty or inconvenience in discharging a burden of making proof does not displace it;[64] and as a matter of principle the difficulty only relieves the party having the burden of evidence from the necessity of creating positive conviction entirely by his own evidence,[65] so that, when he produces such evidence as it is in his power to produce, its probative effect is enhanced by the silence of his opponent.[66]

The court will more readily hold that a party has sustained the burden of evidence where the issue is one as to which the evidence is peculiarly within the adverse party's knowledge or control.[67]

Where the party on whom rests the burden of evidence as to a particular fact has the essential documents or evidence within his control, a peculiar clearness of proof is demanded,[68] although the fact is negative.[69]

IV. PRESUMPTIONS

A. DEFINITION AND NATURE

§ 114. In General

A presumption is an inference of the existence or nonexistence of some fact which courts or juries are required or permitted to draw from the proof of other facts. It has been said to be in the nature of evidence, but has also been considered as a rule of law as to which party shall first proceed and go forward with the evidence.

A presumption is an inference of the existence or nonexistence of some fact which courts or juries are required or permitted to draw from the proof of other facts;[70] an inference which common sense, enlightened by human knowledge and experience, draws from the connection, relation, and coincidence of facts and circumstances with each other.[71]

Nature. It has been said in some jurisdictions, particularly under some statutory provisions, that a true legal presumption is in the nature of evidence, and is to be weighed as such;[72] but it has also been considered that a presumption is generally only a rule of law as to which party shall first proceed and go forward with the evidence, to prove an issue,[73] the presumption being against the party having the burden of proof.[74]

Presumptions arise from motives of public policy and for the sake of greater certainty.[75]

Presumptions are indulged in only to supply facts, and do not arise where the facts are known.[76]

Nature of rule permitting presumption

Rebuttable presumption is "evidence," and rule or principle which permits indulgence in such presumption is a rule of evidence and not a canon of pleading.—Graybiel v. Consolidated Ass'ns, 60 P.2d 164, 16 Cal. App.2d 20.

Rejection

Necessity as basis for presumptions

Presumptions owe their existence to necessity and are based on general experience. The necessity which brings them into existence is the fact that in their absence many meritorious causes would fail through inability to produce affirmative evidence of essential facts, concerning the existence of which the general experience of men leaves but slight doubt.—Beggs v. Presumptions must be based on some necessity, and the court will not go into the domain of presumptions where direct proof can be obtained.[77]

§ 115. Classes of Presumptions and Distinctions

Presumptions have been divided into various classes and kinds, but in general may best be divided into presumptions of fact and presumptions of law; or they may otherwise be classified as conclusive or rebuttable.

While it has been said that there is but one type of presumption in the strict legal meaning of the word, and that is merely a general rule of law that under some circumstances, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, a jury is compelled to reach a certain conclusion of fact, which presumption is raised only in the absence of any real evidence of the existence of the ultimate fact in question, but which is not in and of itself evidence,[78] it has otherwise been said that there are at least four kinds of presumptions: Conclusive presumptions of law; rebuttable presumptions of law; mixed presumptions; and presumptions of fact.[79]

Presumptions may be broadly classified as presumptions of fact, defined and considered infra § 116, and presumptions of law, defined and considered infra § 117. The distinction between these classes of presumptions is that a presumption of fact may be, and a presumption of law must be, regarded by the trier of fact.[80]

Conclusive or rebuttable presumptions. Presumptions are frequently classified as either conclusive or rebuttable.[81] A conclusive presumption is a rule of substantive law, rather than a rule of evidence,[82] while a disputable or rebuttable presumption is a species of evidence that may be accepted and acted on when there is no other evidence to uphold the contention for which it stands;[83] one which may be overcome by other evidence.[84] When a statute makes a presumption conclusive, it cannot be contradicted by evidence.[85] The rule in respect of irrebuttable presumptions rests on grounds of expediency or policy so compelling in character as to override the generally fundamental requirement of law that fact questions must be resolved according to proof;[86] and evidence of certain kinds of

Province of rebuttable presumption

Rebuttable presumption cannot override fact which trier of facts believes to be established by evidence, but the province of a rebuttable presumption is to resolve doubt as to ultimate fact where evidence is not convincing either way.—Hartford-Empire Co. v. Obear-Nester Glass Co., C.C.A.Mo., 71 F.2d 539, affirming, D.C., 51 F.2d 85, certiorari denied 55 S.Ct. 345, 293 U.S. 625, 79 L.Ed. 712.

facts is excluded because its admission would injure some other cause more than it would help the cause of truth, and because avoidance of that injury is considered of more consequence than possible harm to the cause of truth.[87] The characterization of presumptions as rebuttable and irrebuttable is, however, not altogether accurate, for the reason that as a practical matter every presumption is rebuttable by proof that the facts are actually otherwise.[88]

Distinguished from inference. The fundamental characteristic of a presumption, as distinguished from an inference, is that the former affects the duty of producing further testimony, not merely the weight of that already produced.[89] It has also been said that a presumption is a rule which the law makes upon a given state of facts, while an inference is a conclusion which, by means of data founded upon common experience, natural reason draws from facts which are proved;[90] an inference is a permissive deduction while a presumption is a deduction directed to be drawn by law.[91] On the other hand, it has been considered that the terms inference, probability, assumption and presumption, have substantially the same meaning and import when used in legal writings and opinions,[92] but probabilities have been held not legal presumptions.[93]

Dry presumptions. The rules which impose the burden of proof upon certain parties, when designated as presumptions, are "dry presumptions," having only a technical existence, and barren of all probative character when the case goes to the jury on conflicting evidence.[94]

Mixed presumption. A presumption which consists chiefly of certain presumptive inferences which, from their strength, importance, or frequent occurrence, have become in fact a quasi presumption of law; called mixed, because the court lays down the law and the jury acts upon it.[95]

Natural and artificial presumptions. A natural presumption is the presumption arising when a fact is proved, wherefrom by reason of the connection founded on experience, the existence of another fact is directly inferred.[96] A legal or artificial presumption is, where the existence of the one fact is not direct evidence of the existence of the other, but the one fact existing and being proved, the law raises an artificial presumption of the existence of the other.[97]

A violent presumption is one which is very strong and forcible, although not necessarily conclusive or irrebuttable—an inference which the law unhesitatingly requires to be drawn from given facts—a conclusion quite self-evident from the premises;[98] one where the connection between the fact to be inferred and that which is proved is found by experience and observation to be invariable in all instances.[99]

§ 116. Presumptions of Fact

a. In general
b. Necessary basis

a. In General

A presumption of fact is that mental process by which the existence of one fact is inferred from proof of some other fact or facts with which experience shows it is usually associated by succession or coexistence.

A presumption of fact is that mental process by which the existence of one fact is inferred from proof of some other fact or facts with which experience shows it is usually associated by succession or coexistence.[1] It is inseparable from inductive reasoning as an inference of the unknown from proof of the known.[2] It has been said that every presumption is originally a presumption of fact, but may become a presumption of law, and even indisputable in the course of time by universal acceptance of its truth or general recognition of its convenience as a rule of decision.[3] As commonly used in the law of evidence the term "presumption of fact" is applied to certain of the more frequent and strongly probative of the great mass of these logical inferences. In connection with this specific use, not only must the fact from which the inference is drawn be established in evidence, as stated infra § 116 b, and not rest on the accuracy of a reasoning process; but the inference to which it gives rise should, in the majority of cases, be strong and almost inevitable.[4] A failure to comply with these requirements when announcing such a presumption has been severely criticized[5] and the caution deserves attention, as it is on the legally recognized presumptions of fact that the true "presumptions" or assumptions of law are based. It follows from the nature of a presumption of fact that it is rebuttable.[6]

The term "presumption of fact" has been said to be a misnomer in that it amounts to no more than an inference drawn by the jury.[7]

b. Necessary Basis

A presumption of fact must not be drawn from premises which are uncertain, but must be founded on facts established by direct evidence. Presumptions may not be founded on presumptions.

An inference of fact should not be drawn from premises which are uncertain,[8] but the facts on which an inference may legitimately rest must, it is said, be established by direct evidence as if they were the very facts in issue.[9] It follows that one presumption cannot be based on another presump-

22 C.J. p 84 note 71.

Prior or subsequent facts

Courts may draw reasonable infertion,[10] and it has been broadly asserted in many decisions that inferences cannot be founded on inferences from facts existing prior to or subsequent to event for purpose of reaching conclusion of fact.—Shaughnessy v. Morrison, 165 A. 553, 116 Conn. 661.

Reasonable inferences drawn from affirmative facts proved are evidence and not presumptions on presumptions.

Presumption as proof

In action for conversion of personalty contained in filling station wherein there was no direct testimony showing what personalty was in station when defendant took possession thereof, and wherein trial court found that defendant converted personalty, presumption that property which plaintiff had left locked in station remained and continued in condition in which he left it is strong enough to warrant accepting as true presumed fact that defendant had possession of property.—Williams v. Sinclair Refining Co., 47 P.2d 910, 39 N.M. 388.

Purpose and extent of rule

The statutory rule that an inference may not be based on an inference is merely a means of testing logically the relevancy or sufficiency of evidence to prove a fact in dispute, and is not intended to inhibit reasoning processes, and does not forbid judgments based on circumstantial evidence, but a fact that has not been legally proved may not be assumed, and a conclusion may not be based on such a fact.—McKay v. State Industrial Accident Commission of Oregon, 87 P.2d 202, 161 Or. 191.

Necessity of case as determining factor

Inference may be based on another inference only so far as reasonable necessities of case in interest of justice require, and an inference on inference cannot prevail when fact sought to be thus established is capable of more satisfactory proof by direct evidence within reasonable power of party holding burden to produce. Thus, plaintiff suing for injuries sustained while swimming could not recover on evidence composed of inference on inference to show water contained irritant poisons from effluent from defendant's plant where plaintiff did not introduce proof of chemical analysis of water.—Masonite Corporation v. Where probability becomes mere possibility

An inference may be drawn from a primary fact and a subsequent inference drawn therefrom, but as the chain lengthens the safety and dependability of the ultimate inference, measured by legal standards, becomes weaker and weaker until probability becomes only possibility, and when that stage is reached, however strong the possibility may be, the proof is insufficient to support a judgment.—Keffer v. American Stores Co., Pa., 2 Fay.L.J. 43.

Probative force of inference based on inference

The more remote the inference, the more feeble is its probative force.—Burns v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 283 Ill.App. 442.

fact may not be inferred without proof, and another inference drawn from the fact thus assumed.[17] A fact found from circumstantial evidence may be used as a basis for a presumption.[18] It is permissible for a court or jury to draw several conclusions or presumptions of fact from the same state of circumstances,[19] and in order that a presumption may be indulged, it is not necessary to believe that the thing presumed has been actually done, but it is sufficient if the evidence leads to a conclusion that it may have been done, and that its existence would be the solution of the difficulty arising from its nonexistence.[20]

§ 117. Presumptions of Law

A presumption of law is an inference which, in the absence of direct evidence on the subject, the law requires to be drawn from the existence of certain established facts.

A presumption of law is an inference which, in the absence of direct evidence on the subject, the law requires to be drawn from the existence of certain established facts;[21] a presumption which the law compels, and which may be conclusive or rebuttable;[22] a rule of law announcing a definite probative weight attached by jurisprudence to a proposition of logic. It is an assumption made by the law that a strong[23] inference of fact is prima facie correct, and will therefore sustain the burden of evidence, until conflicting facts on the point are shown.[24] Where such evidence is introduced, the presumption is functus officio and drops out of

Sufficiency of evidence required to support inference

Although a conclusion as to an ultimate fact may be based on an inference from circumstantial evidence, in reaching such conclusion, the inference as to the ultimate fact may not be based on an inference as to the existence of the circumstantial facts, and when an inference of the probability of the ultimate fact must be drawn from facts whose existence is itself based only on an inference or chain of inferences, all prior links in the chain of inferences must be shown with the same certainty as is required in criminal cases, in order to support a final inference of the probability of the ultimate fact in issue.—New York Life Ins. Co. v. McNeely, 79 P.2d 948, 52 Ariz. 181.

Circumstances as evidence

That circumstances tending to prove a material fact are shown only as matters of inference from other circumstances may justify the jury in considering them as diminishing the weight or value of the conclusion or final inference, but does not render them inadmissible.—Welsch v. Fiction of law

(1) A "legal presumption" has been called a fiction of law and an assumption for convenience, but assumption is waived where contrary proof is introduced.—H. G. Hill Co. v. Squires, Tenn.App., 153 S.W.2d 425.

(2) "Fictions are to be distinguished from presumptions of law. By the former, something known to be false or unreal is assumed as true; by the latter, an inference is set up, which may be and probably is true, but which, at any rate, the law will not permit to be controverted."—Black L.D. p 495.

As maxims

"Presumptions of law" usually have force of legal maxims and becomes rules of law with definite procedural consequences.—Watkins v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 173 A. 644, 315 Pa. 497, 95 A.L.R. 869.

§ 118. Pseudo-Presumptions

Pseudo-presumptions may be described as so-called presumptions which are in reality not based on inferences of fact but are the statement of rules of substantive law.

In the administration of justice the courts indulge in certain pseudo-presumptions which are not really based on any inference of fact but amount rather to a statement of certain rules of substantive law or of administration which it has been found convenient, and even necessary, to apply in the trial of cases.[29] These pseudo-presumptions are considered hereinafter, as are the various true presumptions of law and of fact, in §§ 120–157.

Examine pocket parts for later cases.

§ 119. Probative Force and Conflict of Presumptions

Presumptions have no probative force, as a general rule. They may, however, support a finding, in a proper case. Where presumptions conflict, one may overcome the other; the stronger of two presumptions, or the less general, prevailing.

No general rule can be laid down as to the effect of a particular presumption in the actual trial of a case, since this depends on the purpose it is designed to serve.[30] It has been said that a presumption cannot in itself possess probative weight,[31] but merely necessitates evidence to meet the prima facie case which it creates;[32] that when the function of a presumption of law sustaining the burden of evidence is ended by the introduction of rebut-

Not to be weighed against evidence

Presumptions cannot be weighed against evidence, since they fade out in the light of evidence no matter how contradictory the evidence may be, and the facts "appear" when the evidence from which facts may be found is introduced, and presumptions disappear when facts appear. Thus where unimpeached witnesses testify distinctly and positively to a fact and are uncontradicted, their testimony should be credited and have the effect of overcoming a mere presumption.—Christiansen v. Hilber, 276 N.W. 495, 282 Mich. 403.

Statutes authorizing weighing of presumptions against evidence

A statute creating disputable presumption to be weighed against contrary evidence is not unconstitutional as denying due process.—Smellie v. Southern Pac. Co., 299 P. 529, 212 Cal. 540.

ting testimony, as stated supra § 117, the presumption of law disappears, leaving in evidence the basic fact, which still retains its probative force and is capable of being weighed against other facts,[33] and that, as stated supra § 115, a presumption of fact becomes inoperative when the actual facts are disclosed, or when it is incumbent on the party relying on the presumption to know the facts.[34] Nevertheless, a presumption stands in lieu of evidence and supports a finding,[35] if not rebutted,[36] or even though there is positive evidence against it.[37] It is logically impossible to balance a fact or the legitimate inferences from it with an assumption, maxim, or other rule of law.[38] Disputable presumptions disappear from the case when controverted or contradicted by undisputed testimony or evidence of the party relying on them.[39] Juries may not without reason overturn legal presumptions.[40]

Conflict of presumptions. Where there is a conflict of presumptions one presumption may be overcome by the other.[41] Thus, where presumptions are of unequal weight, the stronger will prevail.[42] For example, when it is sought to prove fraud by

Presumption made evidence by statute

A disputable presumption, made evidence by statute, may not be dispelled by mere conflict in evidence, and is not dispelled unless the fact opposed thereto is proved as a matter of law.—Ohran v. Yolo County, 104 P.2d 700, 40 Cal.App.2d 298.

Question for jury

(1) A disputable presumption may be controverted by other evidence, and, if such evidence is introduced, jury may weigh evidence and determine whether it sufficiently contradicts presumption, and such a presumption has no weight against an admitted fact and cannot prevail against a proved fact, but is not overcome merely because evidence has been introduced in opposition thereto.—Noble v. Key System, 51 P. 2d 887, 10 Cal.App.2d 132.

(2) In first instance it is for court to say whether evidence is sufficient as matter of law to overcome a presumption, and, if not, question is for jury under proper instruction.—Luna v. Seattle Times Co., 59 P.2d 753, 186 Wash. 618, 105 A.L.R. 932.

the presumption of payment arising from the possession of a negotiable instrument by a person liable on it,[43] or to establish bigamy by the inference of marriage from reputation and cohabitation or the continuance of a former marriage relation,[44] it is commonly declared that the presumption of proper conduct is not overcome by the presumptions mentioned.[45] Where it can be presumed that a party acted rightfully, it should not be presumed from the same facts that he acted wrongfully.[46] In the absence of other evidence, a less general presumption prevails over a more general presumption.[47]

B. PARTICULAR PRESUMPTIONS, AND PRESUMPTIONS ARISING FROM PARTICULAR FACTS

§ 120. Acceptance of Benefits

It is presumed that individuals act as their self-interest requires, and assent to acts by others which are beneficial; the renunciation of a right is not to be presumed.

It is a generally recognized presumption that individuals will act in the manner which their self-interest requires.[48]

Thus it is presumed that individuals assent to acts by third persons which are beneficial.[49] However, before the assent of, or acceptance by, a person will be presumed, it must clearly appear that a benefit to such person will result.[50]

It is not to be presumed that a person renounces a right.[51] Thus, it is not to be presumed that claimant intended to surrender a well-secured claim for one no better secured.[52]

§ 121. Capacity of Women for Childbearing

An adult woman is presumed to be capable of bearing children, and with respect to property rights, the presumption is not affected by her age.

In accordance with the rules, considered in § 150 infra, regarding presumptions as to health and physical condition, an adult woman is presumed to have the normal capacity to bear children.[53]

Effect of age. In the United States the law conclusively presumes, generally in cases involving the rule against perpetuities, the devolution of property, or the right or title to property, that a woman is capable of bearing children at any age of adult life.[54] However, it has been held that this presumption has definitely limited uses,[55] and that the presumption may be rebutted in cases where title to, or the devolution of, property will not be affected.[56]

§ 122. Character

It is generally presumed that the character of an individual is good.

It is a generally recognized presumption, which merely states a rule as to the burden of evidence, that the character of an individual is good.[57] However, in some jurisdictions there is no presumption as to whether the general reputation or character of a person is good or bad.[58]

§ 123. Chastity

A rebuttable presumption exists in favor of chastity and virtue.

There is a presumption against immorality and in favor of chastity and virtue.[59] However, this presumption may be rebutted by evidence to the contrary.[60]

Ky.—Cole v. Ohio Fuel Oil Co., 17 S. W.2d 1029, 1030, 229 Ky. 771, quoting Corpus Juris.

The inference is extremely faint in connection with matters of intrinsic impermanency;[66] and where a fact or condition is not reasonably continuous in its nature, there is no presumption of its continuance.[67] Moreover, the presumption does not apply where there has been a change in conditions.[68]

Presumption as rebuttable. Inferences of continuance are merely inferences of fact and may, therefore, be rebutted.[69]

The inference or presumption disappears when evidence to the contrary,[70] or, it has been held, any evidence, conflicting or otherwise,[71] is introduced. However, evidence which merely raises a doubt of the continuance of the existence of facts shown to have existed has been held to be insufficient to rebut the presumption.[72]

Discretion of court. It is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the trial court whether and to what extent the presumption of the continuance of existing conditions should be entertained.[73]

Jurisdictional fact. The presumption as to the continuance of a fact does not apply to the averment of a jurisdictional fact which must appear as existing at the time when an order based thereon is made.[74]

Corporation "doing business" in state
(1) The status of "doing business" within state within statute governing service of process on foreign corporations, when once established, is presumed to continue unless controverted by other evidence.—Thew Shovel Co. v. Superior Court in and for City and County of San Francisco, 95 P.2d 149, 35 Cal.App.2d 183—San Francisco Breweries v. (2) Relations between Persons

The presumption of the continuance of established facts has been applied to various relations existing between persons, including the relation of husband and wife.

The rule stated in subdivision a of this section respecting the presumption of the continuance of established facts or conditions has been applied to relations between persons.[6] Especially has the rule been applied where the relation is contractual,[7] as in the case of partnership,[8] principal and agent,[9]

(3) Property and Financial Matters

The presumption of continuance of established facts or condition has been applied to matters relating to property, such as its status, value, condition, etc.; and it has also been applied to financial matters, such as one's financial condition and indebtedness.

The general rule respecting the presumption of continuance of a fact or condition shown to have existed, see subdivision a of this section, has been applied to matters relating to property,[16] such as the status of property;[17] the value of property;[18] the existence of an encumbrance;[19] and the condition[20] and location[21] of property.

Transportation of goods
(1) Goods delivered to a carrier in good condition will be presumed to continue so until the contrary is proved.—Bronstein v. Pennsylvania R. R., D.C.Pa., 33 F.Supp. 716—22 C. J. p 90 note 26 [e].

(2) This rule, however, applies only where the property is in the custody of the carrier or carriers, and does not apply after the goods come into the possession of the consignor, or come into the possession of the consignee, and are reshipped. —Price v. Shawmut S. S. Co., 207 N. Y.S. 30, 212 App.Div. 51.

Effect of natural laws
Presumption that property continues in the condition once shown to have existed cannot be indulged where it would run counter to natural laws, as where property that would be affected by the elements is left exposed to them.—Hawkins v. Byrn, 261 S.W. 930, 150 Tenn. 1.

Likelihood of intervening circumstances
In determining whether the condition of a place or thing at the time of an injury can be evidenced by showing its condition before that time, the propriety of an inference that no substantial change has occurred depends on the likelihood of intervening circumstances.—Millman v. U. S. Mortgage & Title Guaranty Co. of New Jersey, 1 A.2d 265, 121 N. J.Law 28.

Promissory notes

(1) Presumption has been applied to ownership of promissory notes.
Ga.—Hobbs v. Citizens' Bank of Wrens, 124 S.E. 72, 32 Ga.App. 522.
Ind.—Conner v. Martin, 92 N.E. 3, 46 Ind.App. 141.

(2) However, on a motion to strike out an answer, it has been held that from the fact that plaintiff may have been the owner of notes sued on and bearer coupons, which were collected on September 1, it does not necessarily follow that plaintiff was their owner on September 2, when complaint was verified, or on September 3, when suit was commenced.—General Inv. Co. v. Interborough Rapid Transit Co., 193 N.Y.S. 881.

(3) Moreover, it has been held that promissory notes are not customarily owned by the same person for many years, and that the presumption of ownership would not apply over a period of sixteen years.—McKenzie v. Evans, 29 P.2d 657, 96 Mont. 1.

Right to use or occupy property is presumed to continue.—New Dells Lumber Co. v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 277 N.W. 673, 226 Wis. 614, denying rehearing 276 N.W. 632, 226 Wis. 614, and 276 N.W. 637, 226 Wis. 628.

Duration; realty and personalty

Duration of the presumption varies with the nature of the property affected, and generally the presumption endures a much greater time with respect to real property than with many forms of personalty.—Ealahan v. Ealahan, 119 A. 349, 98 Conn. 176.

Presumption of nonownership

although the inference may cease by reason of the lapse of considerable time or the ephemeral character of the subject matter.[28]

Financial matters. The presumption of continuance of a fact or condition has been applied to a financial condition shown to have existed,[29] such as solvency or insolvency.[30]

A contract obligation shown to have existed at one time will be presumed to continue until its discharge is shown,[31] and an indebtedness shown to have existed is presumed to continue.[32] The nature of a transaction by which an indebtedness was secured is presumed to remain the same in the absence of a modification.[33]

(4) Other Applications

The presumption of continuance of established facts has been applied to laws, ordinances, legal principles, a state of legality or illegality, nuisances, and various other matters.

Laws which have once been proved or known to exist will be presumed to have continued in effect, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.[34] Thus, a city charter will be presumed to remain in force as originally enacted,[35] and where a city ordinance is shown to have been in force on a certain date, the presumption is that it continued in force.[36] Similarly, the presumption has been applied to prin-

Possession held by agent

The presumption is that one placed in charge and taking possession of premises for another continued so to hold them, until the contrary is shown.—Philadelphia Trust Co. v. Johnson, Tex.Civ.App., 257 S.W. 280—22 C.J. p 91 note 40 [b].

Character of possession; adverse possession

(1) The presumption of continuance applies as regards the character of the possession.—Caffrey v. McFarland, 1 Phila., Pa., 555.

(2) Where defendant had been in possession of the surface of the land in question under a deed recognizing plaintiff's right and title to coal, for purposes of determining whether trespass for removal of coal was barred by limitations, it would be presumed that defendant's possession corresponded with, and continued in accord with, the title under which he entered.—Consolidation Coal Co. v. Friedline, 3 A.2d 200, 134 Pa.Super. 1.

(3) Adverse possession, if shown to have existed, will be presumed to have continued.—Alabama State Land Co. v. Matthews, 53 So. 174, 168 Ala. 200, 202—22 C.J. p 91 note 40 [a].

(4) Similarly, absence of adverse possession, shown by quieting title decree, was presumed to continue, in absence of evidence to contrary.—Gray v. Alabama Fuel & Iron Co., 113 So. 35, 216 Ala. 416.

(5) Proof that possession of land by another than record owner was permissive in its incipiency gives rise to presumption that same party's subsequent possession thereof was also permissive; but such presumption may be overthrown by evidence that his continued possession was adverse to record owner.—Dial v. Armstrong, 113 S.W.2d 503, 195 Ark. 621.

Collectability of accounts

Mont.—Thornton-Thomas Mercantile Co. v. Bretherton, 80 P. 10, 32 Mont. 80.

Salary

(1) Where the salary one was receiving is established, it will be presumed that such salary continued.—Kinsella v. Kinsella, Mo.App., 60 S.W.2d 747.

(2) However, such presumption may be rebutted by checks and vouchers showing reduced salaries receipted for.—Moon Motor Car Co. v. Moon, C.C.A.Mo., 58 F.2d 90.

Betterment of condition

ciples and rules adopted by the judiciary.[37]

Legality or illegality; nuisance. The presumption of continuance of established facts applies to a state of facts which are lawful and regular, and such state will be presumed to continue.[38]

In addition, the presumption applies to statutory violations of a continuous nature, such as engaging in a business or profession,[39] or doing some other act,[40] without having secured the required license or permit; but, on the other hand, where it is shown that the required consent was once obtained, it will be presumed to have continued.[41] A nuisance once shown to exist will be presumed to continue;[42] and where one has consented to a nuisance, such consent will be presumed to continue until withdrawn.[43]

Other matters. The presumption of the continuance of facts or a condition shown to exist has been applied to a highway or street once legally laid out;[44] a rule of a corporation;[45] rules for the operation of street railroads;[46] the pendency of an action shown to have been commenced;[47] the navigability of a stream;[48] and to other facts and conditions.[49]

22 C.J. p 147 note 54.

There is a presumption, similar to the presumption of good character, see § 122 supra, that an individual is of good habits.[61]

§ 128. Identity of Persons

It is generally presumed that when a letter or telegram is received signed by one from whom a reply is expected, such communication is that of the person whose name is so signed; and a presumption of identity may arise in the case of a telephonic communication.

While it has been held that the receipt of a letter purporting to be signed by a person is not evidence that it was written by him,[62] it has also been held that where a letter is transmitted and received through the mail there is a presumption that it was sent by the person referred to therein as the sender;[63] and, as a general rule, where a letter or telegram is received in answer to a prior communication of the receiver, and with the name of the addressee of such prior communication signed thereto, a presumption arises that the latter communication is that of the person whose name is signed thereto,[64] especially, in the case of a letter, if it is written on his business stationery.[65] Similarly, when a person seeks a telephone connection with another, it is presumed that the person with whom the caller is connected is the person called if he purports to be such person.[66]

An identity of name as indicating presumptively an identity of person is considered in the C.J.S. title Names § 15, also 16 C.J. p 542 notes 3–7, 22 C.J. p 92 note 52–p 94 note 68, 23 C.J. p 57 notes 56–58.

§ 129. Identity of Things

Objects of the same name or description are, within limits, presumed to be identical.

It may be presumed within reasonable limits that objects of the same name or description are identical.[67]

§ 130. Innocence

There is a presumption in favor of innocence which applies in civil, as well as in criminal, cases.

It is a well established principle that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the presumption is always in favor of innocence;[68] and while this principle is most important in criminal cases, see Criminal Law § 581, it is frequently invoked and relied on in civil cases,[69] and applies whether the

Attorney in disbarment proceeding
Miss.—Ex parte Redmond, 125 So. 833, 156 Miss. 439.

Change of law pending suit
Where the conduct charged against defendant in a negligence case was criminal at the time, a presumption of innocence available to him in the civil action arose, although the statute making the act complained of a crime was repealed prior to the bringing of the civil action, in view of statute that repeal shall not affect acts done or rights acquired.—Thayer v. Glynn, 106 A. 834, 93 Vt. 257.

Application to wrongful acts generally
(1) The rule does not apply where the act charged, although wrongful, is not fraudulent, dishonest, or criminal.—Adams v. Cook, 100 A. 42, 91 Vt. 281.

(2) The presumption of innocence is not evidence in defendant's favor, in trover.—Livanovitch v. Livanovitch, 131 A. 799, 99 Vt. 327.

In New York
(1) It has been broadly stated that the presumption of innocence is not indulged in civil actions.—In re Byrnes' Estate, 290 N.Y.S. 76, 160 Misc. 474—Coplay Cement Mfg. Co. v. Loeb, 207 N.Y.S. 659, 124 Misc. 640, affirmed 213 N.Y.S. 784, 215 App Div. 805—22 C.J. p 144 note 24 [d] (1).

(2) However, even in cases holding against such presumption in civil actions it has been held that there may be an inference against the commission of a crime in a proper case.—In re Byrnes' Estate, supra.

(3) Further, it has been indicated that the presumption does apply in civil cases, but not to the same extent that it does in criminal cases.—In re Callahan's Estate, 254 N.Y.S. 46, 142 Misc. 28, affirmed In re Callahan, 259 N.Y.S. 987, 236 App Div. 814, affirmed In re Callahan's Estate, 188 N.E. 48, 262 N.Y. 524.

(4) Thus, in many cases the presumption has been accepted, or it has been held that where evidence is susceptible of two constructions the one not implying crime or moral turpitude should be favored.—Berkey v. Third Ave. Ry. Co., 155 N.E. 58, 244 N.Y. 84, 50 A.L.R. 599, reversing 217 N.Y.S. 156, 217 App.Div. 504, motion denied 155 N.E. 914, 244 N.Y. 602, 50 A.L.R. 599—Fox Film Corporation v. Truth of witnesses or evidence
(1) Testimony or other evidence is presumed to be true since it is presumed that witnesses or others would not commit the crime of perjury or falsification.

Weight dependent on other evidence
While this presumption is in nature of evidence aiding jury in arriving at correct conclusion from circumstantial or conflicting evidence, and the burden in overcoming this presumption is to establish the contrary to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury, it is not evidence in the sense that it would create a conflict even though evidence to the contrary was undisputed.—Mutual Life Ins. § 131. Intent and Understanding

Every sane person is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his voluntary words and acts, and to intend to discharge his legal obligations.

It is presumed that every person, if sane[77] and comprehending,[78] knows and intends the natural and probable,[79] but not the remote or incidental,[80] consequences of his voluntary words and acts, including the legal consequences;[81] and this has been called a conclusive presumption.[82] It is also presumed that he intends to do that which he does,[83] and that he understands the nature of instruments signed by him,[84] although executed by mark,[85] or executed for him under his direction,[86] and even though written in a language which he is unable to read or understand.[87]

Every person is presumed to have the intention of discharging whatever duty the law casts upon him,[88] even though the obligation is self-imposed;[89] and, if the intention with which an act is done is fairly open to two interpretations, that interpretation will be favored which assumes that it was performed with a right, rather than a wrong, intention.[90]

It has been said that, since intent is an operation of the mind, it should be proved and found as a fact, and is rarely to be inferred as a matter of law.[91]

Manufacturers of articles ordinarily used for specific purposes will be deemed to intend that they will be appropriated to such use.[92]

"Pseudo-presumption"
Cal.—Murphy v. Sheftel, 9 P.2d 568, 570, 121 Cal.App. 533.
Tex.—Ft. Worth, etc., R. Co. v. Southern Kan. R. Co., Civ.App., 151 S.W. 850, 855.

Foundation of rule
"The familiar legal maxims, that every one is presumed to know the law, and that ignorance of the law excuses no one, are founded upon public policy and in necessity, and the idea back of them is that one's acts must be considered as having been done with knowledge of the law, for otherwise its evasion would be facilitated and the courts burdened with collateral inquiries into the content of men's minds."—Atlas Realty Corporation v. House, 192 A. 564, 567, 123 Conn. 94.

Equal knowledge of parties
The law is presumed to be equally within the knowledge of all parties.
Cal.—Zeh v. Alameda Community Hotel Corporation, 10 P.2d 190, 122 Cal.App. 366.
Okl.—National Surety Co. v. Craig, 220 P. 943, 94 Okl. 63.

Actual knowledge immaterial
"All persons are presumed to know the law. Whether they do in reality know it or not is immaterial as its effects are visited upon all alike."—Miles v. Kilgore, La.App., 191 So. 556, 559.

Opinion or advice as to validity
"A person is charged, at his peril, with knowledge of the law, and is not excusable from obeying it by reason of his personal opinion that the law is unconstitutional, nor can the advice of counsel affecting the validity of any act affect its validity."—State ex rel. Rice v. Hasson Grocery Co., 170 So. 234, 238, 177 Miss. 204, 107 A.L.R. 663.

N.Y.—Gilbert v. Ackerman, 53 N.E. 753, 159 N.Y. 118—Ralston v. Fifth Ave Bond & Mortgage Co., 224 N.Y.S. 44, 130 Misc. 556, affirmed 228 N.Y.S. 882, 223 App.Div. 863, appeal dismissed 164 N.E. 587, 249 N.Y. 569.
Tex.—Bruton v. Texas Power & Light Co., Civ.App., 44 S.W.2d 462.
22 C.J. p 148 note 67 [a] (16).

(2) One must take notice of an act at the time of its passage rather than its effective date.
Minn.—Duncan v. Menard, 21 N.W. 714, 32 Minn. 460.
Ohio.—Matthews v. Raff, 186 N.E. 887, 45 Ohio App. 242, error dismissed 186 N.E. 402, 126 Ohio St. 511.

(3) Where an act is passed which does not become a law until a certain date, a person is not chargeable with notice until it becomes a law; but, where an act becomes a law immediately on passage, but contains provisions postponing the effective date, all persons are chargeable from the date of passage.—Coleman v. Superior Court in and for Calaveras County, 26 P.2d 673, 135 Cal.App. 74.

(4) Law of sister state or foreign country

(1) In General

Knowledge of the law will not be imputed to every person for all purposes, nor are persons presumed to know how a law will be construed. The presumption of knowledge is regarded as merely expressing the rule that ignorance of the law will not relieve from the legal consequences of wrongful acts or of contractual obligations.

It has been broadly stated that the presumption that everyone knows the law is a rule of necessity and is limited in its scope by the reason for it,[1] that it exists wherever necessary to the due administration of justice,[2] and that it merely expresses the rule that ignorance of law will not relieve from the legal consequences of wrongful acts or of contractual obligations.[3] Although, as appears in subdivision a of this section, a number of decisions have held the presumption to be conclusive, the statement of such a presumption by courts and text writers has been called loose language,[4] and its existence declared doubtful[5] and even denied;[6] and other decisions have held that knowledge of the law will not be imputed to every person for all purposes, since there is no inference of fact that the law is known,[7] and that actual knowledge, as a matter of fact, is not established by the presumption alone.[8]

The presumption is not available for the purpose of supplying evidence of a fact material to the controversy.[9]

Persons are not presumed to know how the courts will construe the law,[10] or that a particular law is, or will be held by the courts to be, unconstitutional;[11] nor is the general public presumed to know instructions given or regulations formulated by executive officers for carrying a law into effect;[12] but a post-office employee will be presumed to know the general postal regulations.[13]

Special or private laws are not within the rule and knowledge of them is not presumed.[14]

Illegal or void statutes. It has been said that the presumption that every man knows the law does not hold him to a knowledge of statutes which for any reason are illegal or void.[15]

(2) Where Good Faith Involved

Knowledge of law will not be presumed in order to charge a party with bad faith.

A knowledge of law will not be presumed in order to charge a party with bad faith,[16] nor is there, on the question whether or not one has acted corruptly, a conclusive presumption that he knows the law.[17]

(3) City Ordinances and Resolutions

Persons residing in, or having dealings with, a city are presumed to know its ordinances.

to be known to persons living in the city or having dealings with it; but a person is not presumed to know the ordinances of a city in another state.[20] It will not be presumed, according to one authority, that the state legislature had knowledge of a municipal ordinance;[21] but it has been held that the legislature, in passing an act contemporaneous with a local law covering the same subject, will be deemed to have acted with full knowledge of the local law.[22]

(4) Law of Sister State or Foreign Country

A person is not presumed to know the law of a sister state or foreign country, unless he engages in business, performs work, or owns land, therein.

A person is not presumed to know the law of a sister state or foreign country,[23] unless he engages in business,[24] or undertakes the performance of work,[25] therein, or owns, or deals in, land situated therein.[26] A mistake concerning the statute of another state is treated as a mistake of fact.[27]

c. Charge or Repeal of Law

Persons are presumed to know that laws are subject to change or repeal.

Persons are presumed to know that laws are subject to change[28] or repeal;[29] and, when the law is changed in a particular respect or with respect to a particular matter, all persons are presumed to know of the change.[30]

§ 133. Law of Sister State or Foreign Country

In the absence of a showing to the contrary, the presumption is often indulged that the law of a sister state is the same as, or in accord with, that of the forum; but authorities differ as to the presumption of similarity with respect to the laws of the various foreign countries. More particularly, the common law of a foreign jurisdiction operating under the common law is generally presumed to be similar to the common law of the forum; and many states indulge a presumption of similarity as to the statute law of a sister state, although others do not.

In the absence of a proper showing to the contrary, the presumption is often indulged in by the different courts that the law of a sister state[31]

Application of lex fori for lack of proof of foreign law see Conflict of Laws § 9 b.

N.H.—Connecticut Valley Lumber Co. v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 103 A. 263, 78 N.H. 553.

Public policy

In the absence of a showing to the contrary, the law of a sister state will be presumed to be the same as the law of the local forum in respect to public policy.—Glanton v. Renner, 149 S.W.2d 748, 285 Ky. 808.

Rule of other jurisdiction undetermined

Where court of another jurisdiction has not determined rule on certain proposition, its law thereon will be presumed same as law of the forum.—McDonald v. Hartford Trust Co., 132 A. 902, 104 Conn. 169.

Origin of state unknown

Where no proof is adduced as to what law exists in another state, and no such judicial knowledge can be had of the origin of such state as would raise the presumption of the or that the law of a territory,[32] either generally or as to the particular point in controversy, is the same as, or in accord with, the law of the forum. More specifically, it is presumed, in the absence of evidence, that the law of a sister state,[33] especially its common law,[34] is in accord with the prevalence there of the common law, it will be presumed that the lex fori is the law of such state.—C. D. Chapman & Co. v. Cullifer, 120 So. 297, 23 Ala.App. 31—12 C.J. p 202 note 89.

Insurance

Although an insurance policy provides that it shall be construed according to the law of a foreign state, such law, in the absence of proof, will be presumed to be the same as that of the forum as to the effect and materiality of representations.—Ashe v. Fidelity Mut. Life Ass'n, Tex.Civ.App., 63 S.W. 944.

Sale of corporate assets

In the absence of showing as to the laws of another state with regard to the sale of all the assets of one corporation to another, it will be assumed that these laws are similar to the general rules prevailing in the forum, excluding from consideration any peculiar statutory provisions.—Murrin v. Archbald Consol. Coal Co., 134 N.E. 563, 232 N.Y. 541, affirming 187 N.Y.S. 606, 196 App. Div. 107.

Wash.—Smaby v. Shrauger, 115 P.2d 967.

Foreign law not in force

There has been a judicial refusal to entertain a presumption that any rules of law of France, Spain, or Mexico were ever at any time in force in the Oregon territory.—Woodbury v. U. S. Casualty Co., 120 N.E. 8, 284 Ill. 227.

common law of the forum. In some cases, particularly where the law of the forum is statutory and the assumption of similarity is not made, the presumption has been indulged that the law in the sister state is that of the general common law,[35] including the law merchant,[36] and such part of the statutory law of England as existed before the separation and was generally adopted by the American states,[37] and, further, that the common law is the same in the several states.[38]

A presumption of similarity of law is especially indulged where the sister state was at one time part of the sovereignty of the forum,[39] or has adopted a similar system of jurisprudence.[40]

Many authorities hold that the presumption of uniformity may be indulged, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, with respect to the statutory law of the forum,[41] or with respect to the

Equity

"Where nothing to the contrary appears, it will be presumed that the equity doctrine of a sister state is the same as that of the former where the courts of both states have an equity jurisdiction."—Johnston v. Gawtry, 83 Mo. 339, 342—22 C.J. p 151 note 94.

Interpretation of common law

In the absence of proof to the contrary, it is presumed that the courts of another state agree with those of the forum in the interpretation of the common law.—In re Smith's Estate, 242 N.Y.S. 464, 136 Misc. 863.

Absence of common-law right

A right not arising under the common law of the forum is not presumed to exist under common law of foreign state.—Downs v. Bedford, 146 S.E. 514, 39 Ga.App. 155.

Rule held unchanged by statute

Statute providing that unwritten or common law of another state may be proved as a fact by oral evidence was held not to change the rule stated in the text.—Cherwien v. Geier, 5 N.E.2d 185, 272 N.Y. 165, affirming 279 N.Y.S. 553, 244 App.Div. 814.

State other than original colonies

Since Florida was not one of the thirteen original colonies or derived from territory belonging thereto, a contract of that state would be construed by Georgia courts according to statutes and laws of Georgia, in absence of any pleaded particular statute of that state governing the construction of the contract, or any pleaded general statute adopting the common law of England.—Trustees of Jesse Parker Williams Hospital v. Nisbet, 7 S.E.2d 737, 189 Ga. 807.

State not having common law

(1) Louisiana is not a common-law state and no presumptions of similarity can be drawn as to its law.—Kennard v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., Tenn., 148 S.W.2d 1017.

(2) Since right to specific performance in Missouri comes from the equitable doctrine of the common law, it cannot be presumed that the laws as to specific performance are the same in Texas as in Missouri, because Texas had no common law.—Fidelity Loan Securities Co. v. Bills and notes

(1) The law merchant as to bills and notes is presumed to be the same in other states as in the state where the action is brought.—Dubois v. Mason, 127 Mass. 37, 34 Am.R. 335.

(2) So in a suit on a bill or a note governed by foreign law the provisions of that law as to the allowance of days of grace will be presumed to be the same as those of the law merchant, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.—Reed v. Wilson, 41 N.J.Law 29—8 C.J. p 1002 note 62.

(3) Where it appears that the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law has not been adopted in a sister state, the presumption is, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the law of such sister state is the general law merchant as understood and applied in the forum prior to the adoption of said statute.—Continental Supply Co. v. (2) There is no presumption that the statute law of a common-law state is the same as the statute law of Missouri.—Rositzky v. (3) Some cases have held, without express reference to the sister state as being a common-law state or not, that the law or statutes of such sister state are in accord with the law or statutes of Missouri.—Wooldridge v. Bryan, 270 S.W. 658, 307 Mo. 234—Bennett v. Lohman, 238 S.W. 792, 292 Mo. 477—Hill v Kansas City Rys. Co, App., 251 S.W. 395—Stricker v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co, App., 237 S.W. 894.

(4) It is not presumed that jurisdictional requirements exist, under the laws of a sister state, which do not exist under the law of Missouri.—Keena v. Keena, 10 S.W.2d 344, 222 Mo.App. 825.

Conflicting presumption

Where a special act of another state is shown, the presumption in favor of the constitutionality of legislative acts will prevent a presumption that the constitution of the other state contains a prohibition against such acts, although there should be such a prohibition in the constitution of the forum.—Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Nelson, 70 P. 961, 30 Wash. 340—22 C.J. p 156 note 29.

43. Ky.—Stewart's Adm'x v. Bacon, 70 S.W.2d 522, 253 Ky. 748.

Negotiable instruments law

It will not be presumed that a negotiable instruments law is in force in a sister state, but it will be presumed that the common law prevails.—Demelman v. Brazier, 79 N E. 812, 193 Mass. 588.

Taxation

In a proceeding to tax resident trustees on personal property, such as stocks and bonds, located in a foreign state and bequeathed by a foreign testator to residents of another foreign state, it cannot be presumed that there is any law in the state where the property is located which allows it to tax the property.—Welch v. Boston, 109 N.E. 174, 221 Mass. 155, Ann.Cas.1917D 946.

Liability without negligence

It is not presumed that a sister state has enacted a statute like that of the forum making a railroad liable, without regard to negligence, for injuries to domestic animals.—Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Betts, 15 P. 821, 10 Colo. 431.

Statutes presumed different

The statutes of other states are presumed to be different from the statutes of the forum if their judicial decisions are different from those of the forum.—Chavez v. Haynie, 225 P. 852, 75 Colo. 414.

In federal court

Where action for breach of contract was originally brought in federal court, there is no presumption that laws of state where contract was made are same as laws of state of forum.—Brown v. Ford Motor Co., C.C.A Okl., 48 F.2d 732.

given a construction in such state such as will enable those having claims thereunder to enforce them as therein provided.[47]

Foreign countries generally. In the case of a foreign country which has a common-law jurisprudence,[48] such as England[49] or Canada,[50] it is presumed that the law of such country, or at least its common law, corresponds with that of the forum. As to other countries, particularly those which have essentially different institutions, or which operate under the civil law, some authorities have refused to indulge a presumption of similarity;[51] thus, there is no presumption that the common law of the forum obtains in foreign countries whose jurisprudence is not based on the common law.[52] On the other hand, it has been presumed that even in such countries a contract creates liability,[53] and that liability exists in all foreign jurisdictions for rudimentary wrongs or torts;[54] further, in many cases a presumption of similarity has been extended to foreign countries without express reference to the system of jurisprudence there prevailing.[55] As to

Nature and strength of presumption; judicial notice. The presumption of similarity of the laws of another state has been said to be nothing more than a rule of procedure which places on the party claiming dissimilarity the burden of so proving.[57] A presumption of similarity of common law or statute law will obtain only in the absence of judicial cognizance as to such law,[58] or of pleading and proof as to such law, by direct or circumstantial evidence.[59] The presumption that the law of a sister state is the same as that of the forum may be rebutted by decisions of the highest court of the sister state,[60] or by proof as to the statutes of such state on the subject.[61]

Effect of judicial notice statute
Where attention of the court is not called to statute or decision of another state, parties cannot take advantage of statute providing that the courts of the forum shall take judicial notice of foreign laws, and it will be presumed that law of other state on subject in question is same as that of the forum, or at least the same as the common law of the forum.—Hanson v. Hanson, 191 N.E. 673, 287 Mass. 154, 93 A.L.R. 701—Seemann v. Eneix, 172 N.E. 243, 272 Mass. 189.

Standard form of insurance policy
Where a statute of a sister state, requiring a standard form of fire insurance policy, has been pleaded, it is not presumed that such sister state has another statute which has not been pleaded, and which would be contrary in part to the provisions of the standard policy.—Woodard v. Security Ins. Co. of New Haven, Conn., 207 N.W. 351, 201 Iowa 378.

where to do so would impose a penalty,[62] or work a forfeiture;[63] and no assumption will be made regarding the law of a foreign country which would avoid a transaction.[64]

Presumption of continuance. In general, where similarity of the law of a foreign jurisdiction, or of a provision of the foreign law, is established, such similarity or provision of law will be assumed to continue to exist;[65] so this presumption of continuance is applied where a similarity of law has been shown[66] or is recognized or assumed to exist,[67] as in case of a former unity of territory,[68] or where a particular rule, statutory[69] or unwritten,[70] has been shown to be part of the law of a foreign country[71] or a sister state.[72] The repeal of a statute by the legislature of the forum carries no implication of the repeal of a similar statute in the foreign state.[73]

The court will presume that the common law has remained unchanged in England since the separation of the United States from that country.[74]

Disabilities and privileges of coverture. According to some authorities, if the statute of the state where the contract of a married woman was made is not proved, it will be presumed that the common-law rule prevails in that state.[75] Other authority holds that in the absence of contrary proof, the court will not presume that the common law prevails in another jurisdiction,[76] but will presume that statutory law similar to its own regulating the rights of married women prevails.[77]

ty;[79] conversely, there is no presumption in favor of illegality, or violation of statute,[80] or against legality.[81] In other words, facts consistent with legality are presumed to exist,[82] and where a situation is explainable on the basis of legality it will be assumed that such is the true explanation.[83] These principles present a rule of administration that he who claims the existence of illegality must prove it.[84]

With respect to an intent to obey or violate the law, the same principles obtain; that is, the presumption is in favor of an intent to obey the law,[85] and against any intent to violate it;[86] conversely, there is no presumption of intent to violate the law.[87]

Although the exact order in which acts took place may be shown if required by the interests of justice,[88] it will be assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the order in which acts are done is that which is essential to their legal operation;[89] in other words, where an act is done which can be done legally only after the performance of some prior act, proof of the later act carries with it a presumption of due performance of the prior act.[90] In an action on a contract, the validity of which depends on whether one of the parties was licensed or authorized to transact the particular business to which the contract related, it will be presumed that he was duly authorized.[91]

In applying the foregoing principles, presumptions have been indulged in favor of the legality of particular agreements or instruments[92] and their purposes,[93] the purposes of an organization,[94] the conduct of a business,[95] the activities of a charitable or religious corporation,[96] the issuance of bonds,[97] the possession of various documents or instruments,[98] and the possession of, or an entry on, land.[99]

§ 135. Love of Life and Avoidance of Danger

a. In general
b. Suicide

a. In General

There are presumptions favoring love of life, avoidance of harm or danger, and with some limitations, exercise of ordinary care.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, there is a presumption that a person possesses a love of life and the instinct to preserve it.[6] So, it is presumed that no one will voluntarily do an act which places his own life[7] or the lives of others[8] in danger; on the contrary, the presumption is that a person will endeavor to avoid danger.[9]

Exercise of care. It is sometimes stated broadly that there is a presumption that a person killed or injured, or one encountering peril, was exercising ordinary care at the time,[10] the presumption being based on the instinct of self-preservation and the disposition of men to avoid personal harm,[11] or, in some jurisdictions, on statute.[12] With these statements, however, should be contrasted the principles set forth in the C.J.S. title Negligence §§ 205, 206, also 45 C.J. p 1151 note 10–p 1162 note 42, as to the absence of such a presumption in instances where a party has the burden of proving his freedom from contributory negligence. In any event, this presumption is prima facie only,[13] and rebuttable;[14] it ceases on a showing of facts nega-

3. Registration of deed
Under at least one statute, there is a conclusive presumption that a deed registered for more than twenty years was registered on lawful authority; and no distinction is made between a void acknowledgment and a defective acknowledgment.—Richardson v. Schwoon, 3 Tenn.App. 512.

Misinterpretation of statute
Evidence that part of retail price of text-books went to central depository rebutted presumption that the company selling the books made its bid according to correct interpretation of a law requiring company to pay cost of depository; but such misinterpretation of the statute does not overcome presumption that other companies made bids according to legal interpretation thereof.—Hill v. Presumption as inference
The word "presumption," as used in an instruction that the law presumes that a person injured, prompted by a natural instinct to avoid danger, exercised care, is not used in its ordinary technical sense, but as meaning inference, and as a substitute for the word "inference."—Bell v. Incorporated Town of Clarion, 84 N.W. 962, 964, 113 Iowa 126.

Animals. It may be presumed that a dog will avoid danger or not move into it,[17] unless he is helpless or indifferent to danger.[18]

b. Suicide

There is a rebuttable presumption against suicide on the part of a sane, normal person. Authorities differ as to whether the presumption is one of law and whether it is itself evidence.

There is no presumption of suicide,[19] nor does such a presumption arise from the mere fact of death in an unknown manner;[20] there is, rather, a presumption against suicide or self-destruction[21]

Effect of presumption

(1) "The presumption against suicide is not evidence, but it does require the opposing party to bring forth evidence to overcome it."—Carroll v. Prudential Ins. Co. of er be given weight as evidence,[34] and is a rule to which resort may be had only when there is a failure of evidence.[35]

While the presumption against suicide is a strong one,[36] and stands until overcome by testimony,[37] it is prima facie only,[38] rebuttable,[39] and not a rigid rule of law.[40] The presumption operates to its fullest extent only where there is no proof as to whether the death was accidental or suicidal.[41] It disappears, or at least does not prevail, where the proof shows the manner of death[42] or points to suicide,[43] or where the circumstances are wholly in-

America, 15 A.2d 810, 813, 125 N.J. Law 397.

(2) Presumption against suicide is not evidence, but it controls result when there is lack of competent evidence to show death by suicide, and also controls in cases of death by unexplained violence if defendant relies on suicide and fails to go forward with proof thereof.—Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Johnson, 166 So. 442, 122 Fla. 567.

(3) Where evidence discloses a state of facts consistent with accident or suicide, the presumption against suicide, although not evidentiary in character, accomplishes a function of evidence for that particular occasion.—Gilpin v. Ætna Life Ins. Co., 132 S.W.2d 686, 234 Mo. App. 566.

Evidence of accident required

In action for accidental death benefits under life policies, jury could consider nonprobability of death by suicide; but such nonprobability could not take place of evidence required of plaintiff that death was accidental.—Walters v. consistent with any hypothesis of accidental death,[44] or where the proof leaves no room for any reasonable hypothesis but suicide.[45]

The evidence required to overcome the presumption is not confined to that of eyewitnesses,[46] although where circumstantial evidence is relied on the facts shown must be such as to exclude any reasonable hypothesis of natural or accidental death,[47] or, in other words, must exclude every reasonable hypothesis except suicide.[48] It has been held that a mere preponderance of evidence is sufficient to rebut this presumption;[49] but clear, cogent, and convincing evidence has been required.[50]

Presumption of accidental death. As a general rule, the presumption is that a death was accidental, not suicidal,[51] where the cause was either accident or suicide[52] and there is no evidence explaining the cause.[53] Even self-inflicted death is presumed to have been accidental rather than suicidal.[54] On the other hand, it has been asserted that accidental death, as opposed to self-inflicted death, is no more to be legally presumed than suicide is to be presumed against homicide.[55]

Sanity or insanity of deceased. The presumption against suicide exists where deceased was sane[56] and normal,[57] but not where the person whose death is unexplained was insane.[58] Even a slight mental unsoundness or derangement may be considered in determining whether deceased committed suicide, although it does not prevent giving weight to the presumption against suicide.[59]

Presumption of receipt of telegrams see infra § 148.

Effect of presumption

When the presumption arises, the burden rests on the addressee to prove that he never received the communication, or the information that it contained, from any authorized source.—Executive Committee of Christian Education and Ministerial Relief for Presbyterian Church of U. S. v. Fidelity & Columbia Trust Co., 117 S.W.2d 958, 273 Ky. 715.

Rule unaffected by contents

"The contents of the envelope have nothing to do with the rule or the reason for it. Hence, it applies just as much where a legal paper is mailed as where the inclosure is an ordinary business communication."—In re Nelson's Estate, 231 N.W. 218, 220, 180 Minn. 570—22 C.J. p 96 note 92 [1].

Loss of contents

Plaintiff's evidence that he inclosed a letter in an envelope, and the presumption that it remained there, rebut an argument that the envelope may have been empty when received.—Ladd v. Cochran & McCluer Co., 274 Ill.App. 427.

the receipt therefor had authority so to do;[66] and the date of the registry receipt acknowledging delivery of a letter duly posted and registered by mail, is such prima facie proof of receipt on that date as to require the addressee to rebut it.[67]

Nature and strength of presumption. The presumption of the receipt of mail matter from its regular mailing is considered by most authorities a presumption of fact, based on the circumstances of the particular case,[68] and not a presumption at law;[69] however, some authorities have characterized the presumption as one of law.[70] Still others have referred to proof of due mailing not as creating a presumption, either of fact or of law, but rather as prima facie evidence of receipt,[71] or as a legal basis, or relevant circumstance warranting an inference or finding that the letter was received in due course.[72]

The presumption of receipt of matter properly mailed is a strong one,[73] and is sufficient to justify a finding of receipt in the absence of evidence to the contrary.[74] Indeed, in the absence of evidence of the nonreceipt of the letter by the addressee, it has been considered the duty of the court or jury to find in favor of the presumption,[75] and the verdict of a jury or the finding of a judge in opposition to this inference of fact, when based on no evidence of nonreceipt,[76] or of delay in transmission,[77] is against the weight of the evidence and will not be allowed to stand. However the pre-

On the other hand, that the presumption is not a strong one was indicated in an early case, where it was said that the presumption is "contradicted daily by the immense dead letter collections never received by correspondents, and requiring the constant employment of several clerks to overhaul and dispose of, in our own general post-office alone."—Allen v. sumption is not conclusive,[78] and does not apply under all circumstances.[79]

Circumstances affecting presumption. The presumption of receipt of mail matter may be affected by other facts;[80] thus, the presumption is strengthened where it is shown that it was not returned to the sender, although the envelope bore a return address,[81] where the addressee is well-known,[82] where the letter is found in the possession of the addressee,[83] where receipt of the letter is not denied,[84] where the conduct of the addressee is inconsistent with nonreceipt of the letter,[85] or where the addressee acknowledges receipt of a letter, and the letter in question was the only one written to him by the writer at about that time.[86] Where several papers were inclosed in one envelope and sent by mail, and it is shown that one of them was received, the presumption that all of them were received is strong.[87]

b. Address

Receipt of mail matter by the person for whom it was intended is not presumed unless it was properly addressed to him.

Receipt of mail matter by the person for whom it was intended cannot be presumed unless it is proved that the matter was properly addressed to him,[88]

Postal employee

The presumption is unavailable to a postal employee against whom a claim is made because of irregularities and losses on his route; so far as he is concerned the presumption carries up to, but not through, his route, so that the inference is that he received the package.—Boerner v. U. S., D.C.N.Y., 30 F.Supp. 635, affirmed, C.C.A., 117 F.2d 387.

Statute requiring registered mail

The presumption of receipt of a letter sent by ordinary mail does not satisfy the requirements of a statute providing for notice by registered mail—Universal Credit Co. v. Clay County Trading Co., 180 So. 259, 235 Ala. 577.

Receipt of other letters

(1) Evidence that another letter, addressed in same manner as letter in question, was received by addressee, may be considered in determining whether or not presumption will arise—W. E. Richmond & Co. v. Security Nat. Bank, 64 S.W.2d 863, 16 Tenn.App. 414.

(2) Proof that a letter, properly addressed and stamped and bearing the sender's return address, was deposited in the same mail as two other letters addressed to other offices of the addressee, and that the other two letters were received, raises a rebuttable presumption that the first letter was received.—Hand & Johnson Tug Line v. Canada S. S. Lines, C.C.A.Ohio, 281 F. 779.

Application for life insurance

Presumption that applicant for life insurance received mailed notice of declination of application was particularly applicable where no policy was ever issued.—Columbian Nat. Life Ins. Co. v. Rodgers, C.C.A.Kan., 93 F.2d 740.

Presumption of mailing

(1) "There is no presumption with respect to the mailing; that fact must be proved by competent evidence."—McGonigle v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 46 P.2d 687, 693, 100 Mont. 203.

(2) Mailing of a letter is not presumed from the mere fact that it was written or dictated.—Phelps v. Holden, 175 A. 250, 107 Vt. 1—Jacobs v. National Accident & Health Ins. Co., 151 A. 565, 103 Vt. 5—22 C.J. p 99 note 14 [c].

(3) However, where a copy of a letter which an official had the duty of sending was found in his desk after his death, the original was presumed to have been sent.—Farmers' State Bank & Trust Co. of Gorman v. Central State Bank of Dallas, Tex.Civ.App., 281 S.W. 632.

Construction of testimony

(1) Testimony that a letter was "mailed" is equivalent to a state-

those things which are necessary to impose on the government officers and employees the duty of transmitting and delivering the matter.[93] Such proof need not consist of direct and positive testimony to the ultimate fact of mailing;[94] and proof of the existence of an office practice or custom in the mailing of letters, together with proof that the custom was followed in the particular instance, may constitute sufficient evidence of mailing to support a presumption of due receipt.[95] Where proof of an office routine or business practice is relied on to establish mailing, the person who is claimed to have mailed the letter ordinarily must appear[96] and testify that he complied with the custom and performed his duty;[97] but there is authority to the contrary.[98]

The mail matter must have been deposited in the United States mail at one of the depositories provided by the United States for receiving mail.[99]

ment that it was properly addressed, stamped, and deposited in a proper place for the receipt of mail, and raises a presumption that it was received in due course.

(2) Testimony of attorney that he forwarded letter "through due course of mail," imports that letter was properly addressed, stamped, and deposited in mail.—Wichita Valley Ry. Co. v. Davis, Tex.Civ.App., 275 S.W. 169, 170.

(3) Testimony that a person "wrote" a letter to another has been held sufficient to authorize an inference that it was received, in the absence of evidence of nonreceipt.—Sinclair Refining Co. v. Giddens, 187 S.E. 201, 54 Ga.App. 69.

(4) Testimony that witness "supposed" stamped letter reached United States mail is no evidence that it reached custody of United States authorities.—Tharp v. Loeb Hardware Co., 135 So. 412, 413, 24 Ala.App. 344.

Long series of correspondence

Rule that no presumption of delivery of mail arises without proof of actual deposit in mail and prepayment of postage is inapplicable to long series of correspondence handled in usual course of business.—Stewart Bros. v. Brewer, 148 So. 657, 177 La. 389.

Requirements as to office practice

(1) To establish mailing of a letter in the absence of direct evidence, there must be proof of an invariable custom in an office of depositing mail in a certain receptacle, that the letter in question was deposited in such receptacle, and that the employee whose duty it was to deposit the mail in the post office either actually deposited that mail in the post office or that it was his invariable custom to deposit every letter left in the usual receptacle.—U. S. v. Rice, D.C.Tex., 281 F. 326.

(2) Proof of a mere "custom" to mail all letters is insufficient, for "the word 'custom' implies only that such letters are generally and usually mailed."—Collins v. Hoover, 218 S.W. 940, 942, 205 Mo.App. 93.

Reason for rule

"We cannot presume the stenographer performed her duty, and, upon that, base a presumption that the letter was received. One presumption may not be based on another"—Mankin v. Parry, 70 Pa.Super. 558, 560.

Proof held insufficient

The presumption does not arise on evidence that a letter was merely placed in a cigar box used to hold letters which were to be mailed by some grocery employee, there being no direct or positive evidence that it was so mailed.—W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Burney, 102 S.E. 358, 25 Ga.App. 20.

I. Case Co. v. Sinning Bros. Motor Co., supra

99. Iowa.—Gregory v. Kirkman Consol Independent School Dist., 173 N.W. 243, 186 Iowa 914.

"Due posting" includes not only writing and addressing the letter, but also stamping and placing it in the United States mail.—Tharp v. Loeb Hardware Co., 135 So. 412, 24 Ala.App. 344.

"Mailed" explained

"By the term 'mailed' is necessarily meant the deposit of the letter in a United States post office or United States postal mail box, or in the custody of a United States mail collector."—W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Burney, 102 S.E. 358, 359, 25 Ga.App. 20.

A letter deposited in a post office is duly mailed.[1] However, the deposit need not be at the post office,[2] and it is sufficient that the letter was deposited in a government street letter box,[3] a mail box on a rural delivery route,[4] or a mail chute shown to be connected with a government letter box.[5] A letter delivered to an official letter carrier while on his official route,[6] or to a United States mail agent while on duty on a mail train,[7] is duly mailed; but it is not sufficient to show that the letter was given to a regular mail carrier to perform acts outside his duties before placing it in the mail.[8]

A postmark on the envelope affords a presumption that the letter was mailed.[9]

Where a letter was mailed in a foreign country to an address in the United States, the court has refused to draw an inference of receipt.[10]

Date of mailing. It is not presumed that a letter was mailed on the day indicated by the postmark on the envelope,[11] although such postmark is a circumstance for the jury to consider.[12] The date of a letter authorizes no inference or presumption that it was mailed on that day;[13] nor is the date of a check evidentiary as to when it was mailed.[14] A presumption that a letter, received many days after the sender's death, was not mailed before such death does not preclude proof that it was in fact mailed while the sender was alive.[15]

(2) Prepayment of Postage

Due mailing, to support the presumption of receipt, requires prepayment of the postage.

It is very generally held that matter is not duly mailed, so as to give rise to a presumption of receipt by the addressee, unless it appears that the matter was duly stamped, or, in other words, that the postage was prepaid.[16] It has, however, been asserted that evidence that a letter was mailed raises a presumption that the necessary postage was paid,[17] and that an officer's return that service was "duly" made by mail may be regarded as a statement that postage was prepaid, where the addressee does not pretend that in fact he did not receive the notice mailed.[18]

d. Time of Receipt

The presumption is that mail matter was received in the ordinary course of the mails.

The addressee of mail matter is presumed to have received it as soon as it could have been transmitted to him in the ordinary or regular course of the mails, or as it is otherwise expressed, in due course of the mails.[19]

Receipt at a particular time cannot ordinarily be presumed unless there is proof of the course of the mails, or the probable time necessary for transmission,[20] as well as of the date of mailing,[21] except where such facts may be judicially noticed, see supra § 52. However, the presumption has been held to be that a letter mailed in a city to a place within the same city was received on the following day,[22] at least where mailed in the evening;[23] and it has also been held in the case of a letter mailed to a point in the same city that it was delivered either on the day of mailing or on the following day.[24] In the case of a letter mailed from one city to another, it has been assumed, under the particular circumstances, that it did not reach the addressee until the next day,[25] or that it reached him not later than the second day after mailing.[26]

e. Rebuttal of Presumption

The presumption of receipt of mail matter may be rebutted. According to most authorities, evidence of nonreceipt creates an issue of fact.

The presumption of due receipt of a letter or other mail matter may be rebutted[27] by evidence that it was not in fact delivered or received,[28] or was not received in the ordinary course of the mails,[29] or by evidence tending to show that the letter was never mailed.[30] The inference of delivery to the addressee in person may be destroyed by a contrary inference arising from a course of busi-

Receipt by unauthorized persons

(1) Mailed notices are not presumed received by addressees, where it appears that they were in fact received by persons not shown to be authorized agents of addressees.—White v. Bank of Rex, 150 S.E. 565, 40 Ga.App. 558.

(2) The presumption of receipt was overcome by testimony showing receipt of letters by others than corporation to which they were addressed.—E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Grand Rapids Brewing Co., 273 N.W. 388, 280 Mich. 49.

Third persons' denial of receipt

(1) Presumption was not rebutted by testimony of addressee's husband that addressee never received notice.—Darby v. McIntyre, 174 S.E. 181, 49 Ga.App. 115.

(2) Presumption was held not overcome by testimony of office manager not under duty to receive letter that the letter was not received.—Home Ins. Co. v. Head, 138 S.E. 275, 36 Ga.App. 779.

ness routine in the addressee's office whereby letters are diverted from him to the hands of an employee.[31]

As a general rule, evidence of nonreceipt of mail matter does not nullify the presumption,[32] even though it consists of the addressee's positive denial of receipt,[33] but merely creates an issue of fact for the jury, or for the court sitting without a jury,[34] with such weight given to the presumption as the trier of facts thinks it entitled to,[35] the burden of proving receipt remaining throughout on the party who asserts it.[36] However, according to some authorities the addressee's positive denial of the receipt of mail matter renders the presumption of little weight[37] or may even entirely overcome it, especially if uncontradicted;[38] and it has been held

Proof of diversion not conclusive

Evidence by addressee that another person in his employment opened his mail, and that addressee had never seen nor heard of the communication, and that the same cannot be found in his office after careful search, does not conclusively establish as a fact that he did not receive the communication.—Wilson v. Martin, 109 S.E. 294, 27 Ga.App. 549.

that such denial, or other proof of nonreceipt, raises a presumption that the letter was never mailed.[39]

Testimony of the addressee that the letter was not received should be regarded with caution,[40] and his failure to recollect whether or not the letter was received,[41] or his impression that it was not received,[42] or the fact that he had no record of the receipt of the letter,[43] or that the letter was not found on file,[44] or was not found among his papers after his death,[45] is usually deemed insufficient to overcome the presumption of receipt. The presumption is not overcome by testimony of some of the officers of a corporation or firm that they did not receive the letter, where it is not also shown that no one else in authority received it.[46]

§ 137. Nature and Condition of Property

Particular property is presumed to be in the nature and condition usually found in similar circumstances.

With respect to the nature and condition of property, it may be presumed that the situation is that which is usually found to exist under circumstances similar to those of the particular case;[47] but there can be no presumption that a condition which, while not extraordinary, is other than that which is usually found to exist, was present in any particular case.[48]

§ 138. Official Character or Status

It will be presumed that a public officer has been duly elected or appointed and has qualified; but the presumption may be rebutted.

It will be presumed that public officers, including persons acting in an official capacity,[49] have been duly elected or appointed[50] and that they have qual-

Disappearance as prima facie evidence

As soon as evidence is introduced that warrants a finding that letter failed to reach its destination, the artificial compelling force of the prima facie evidence of delivery disappears, and evidence of nondelivery has to be weighed against likelihood that the mail service was efficient in the particular instance with no artificial weight on either side of the balance.—Hobart-Farrell Plumbing & Heating Co. v. Klayman, 19 N.E.2d 805, 302 Mass. 508.

Return address

The presumption is entirely overcome by uncontradicted evidence of nonreceipt unless there was aliunde evidence that it was in fact received; and the mere fact that a return address was on the envelope, and that the letter was never returned, does not of itself amount to such aliunde evidence.—W. T. Rawleigh Medical Co. v. Burney, 102 S.E. 358, 25 Ga.App. 20.

Contradiction of addressee

Presumption that addressee received letter is not conclusively rebutted by denial of receipt where addressee's testimony has been contradicted.—Bennett v. Igleheart Bros., 139 S.E. 431, 37 Ga.App. 200.

Rule held inapplicable

The rule that the presumption of receipt may be rebutted by uncontradicted evidence of nonreceipt does not apply to the mailing of an acceptance of a contract in response to an offer previously mailed, except that the evidence of nonreceipt may be considered with other circumstances on the question of mailing.—Rowntree Bros. v. Bush, 111 S.E. 217, 28 Ga.App. 376.

ified.[51] An application of this presumption is found in cases where one who is charged with liability for certain acts seeks to justify himself under his official authority.[52] The presumption applies with regard to foreign, as well as domestic, officers.[53] However, the presumption of a regular appointment does not apply to a public officer seeking to recover salary attached to the office, or the benefits of a pension system.[54]

Officers to whom applicable. Among officers to whom this presumption has been applied may be mentioned a highway officer;[55] internal revenue officers;[56] justices of the peace;[57] military officers;[58] a notary public;[59] an officer of elections;[60] an officer of the federal patent office;[61] peace officers, such as policemen and constables;[62] a probate judge or surrogate;[63] a public surveyor;[64] revenue and customs officers;[65] school officers;[66] sheriffs;[67] tax officers;[68] and a United States marshal.[69]

Presumption rebuttable. The presumption that a person assuming to act in the capacity of a public officer was duly appointed is prima facie merely, and may be rebutted.[70]

Prospective election or appointment. Where a time is fixed by statute for the election or appointment of an officer, it is to be presumed that the election or appointment will be made according to law, although such provision may be directory rather than mandatory.[71]

§ 139. Ordinary Course of Affairs

Unless a contrary showing is made, the presumption is that the ordinary course of business or conduct was followed in a particular case.

It is a well established rule of evidence that events or facts which usually happen or coexist in the ordinary course of business and other human affairs are presumed to have happened or coexisted in any particular case, unless the contrary appears from the evidence.[72] In the absence of a contrary showing, it is to be presumed that the ordinary course of business or conduct was followed in a particular case.[73] Conversely, where facts and circumstances are not such as human experience indicates usually coexist, it will not be presumed that they coexist in any particular case.[74]

Presumptions arising from the ordinary course of affairs are presumptions of fact, and like other presumptions of fact, are rebuttable[75] and may be overcome by substantial countervailing evidence.[76]

Presumptions as to particular matters not specifically treated herein, as for example, presumptions relating to knowledge of facts or to corporate acts and records, are discussed infra § 150.

§ 140. Past and Future Existence of Fact or Condition

a. Past existence of fact or condition
b. Future existence of fact or condition

a. Past Existence of Fact or Condition

Mere proof of the existence of a present condition or state of facts generally does not raise any presumption that the same condition or facts existed at a prior date, but the rule is not of universal application.

As a general rule mere proof of the existence of a present condition or state of facts or proof of the existence of a condition or state of facts at a given time, does not raise any presumption that the same condition or facts existed at a prior date,[77] since inferences or presumptions of fact ordinarily do not run backward.[78]

Mo.—Snowwhite v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 127 S.W.2d 718, 344 Mo.

However, the general rule is not of universal application.[79] Whether the past existence of a condition or state of facts may be inferred or presumed from proof of the existence of a present condition or state of facts, or proof of the existence of a condition or state of facts at a given time, depends largely on the facts and circumstances of the individual case,[80] and on the likelihood of intervening circumstances as the true origin of the present existence or the existence at a given time.[81] Accordingly, in some circumstances, an inference as to the past existence of a condition or state of facts may be proper,[82] as, for example, where the present condition or state of facts is one that would not ordinarily exist unless it had also existed at the time as to which the presumption is invoked.[83] An inference that a state of affairs existed at a certain time may be reinforced by evidence that it continued to exist at a subsequent time.[84]

Financial condition. Proof of the existence of a particular financial condition on a given date may or may not establish the basis of a logical inference that such condition existed at a date prior thereto, depending on the length of time over which it is sought to carry the inference back and the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[85]

Insanity. Proof of insanity does not create a presumption of its past existence,[86] unless it is shown to be of an habitual and permanent nature.[87]

b. Future Existence of Fact or Condition

Ordinarily, there is no presumption that a state of facts or conditions which is shown to exist will continue to exist in the future.

Ordinarily, there is no presumption that a state of facts or conditions which is shown to exist will continue to exist in the future.[88]

However, in a proper case, the existence of life on a given date will give rise to an inference of fact or presumption that it will continue in the future,[89] although it will not be presumed to continue indefinitely.[90]

§ 141. Personal Status and Condition

Various presumptions arise in respect of personal status and condition, such as those relating to solvency, infancy, etc.

Various presumptions may arise in respect of personal status and condition.[91]

In the absence of contrary evidence, it will be presumed that a child was born alive[92] and was conceived two hundred and eighty days before birth;[93] that persons shown to be brother and sister are of the full blood;[94] that parties are of legal age[95] and competent to bind themselves;[96] that litigants are sui juris when they appear as such,[97] and that children under twelve years of age are not sui juris;[98] that a party plaintiff has legal capacity to sue[99] and is a resident of the county in which he sues;[1] and that a person is solvent and not insolvent.[2]

On the other hand, there exists no presumption

Adjudication of insanity as raising presumption of prior insanity see the C.J.S. title Insane Persons § 32, also 32 C.J. p 647 notes 5–9.

Presumptions as to sanity and mental capacity see infra § 147.

Intermittent or temporary insanity

Where the insanity shown to exist is merely intermittent or temporary and not permanent, no presumption of its existence at a given prior time arises.—Sommerville v. Greenhood, 210 P. 1048, 65 Mont. 101.

Presumption as part of doctrine of continuity

The doctrine of continuity is limited to the presumption that something which has been shown to have existed has thereafter continued to exist, see supra § 124, and does not include a presumption that something shown to exist will continue in the future.—Glenn v. Tankersley, 200 S.E. 709, 187 Ga. 129.

91. Joint liability of promisors

Statutory presumption of joint liability of persons uniting in promise is not conclusive.—Cole v. Low, 254 P. 676, 81 Cal.App. 633.

Need of educational fund

In the absence of a contrary showing, it will be presumed that a man forty-eight years of age has finished his education and is not in need of an educational fund.—Suggett's Trustees v. Pirtle, 251 S.W. 959, 199 Ky. 713.

Quantum of Indian blood

In the absence of proof, court will not presume that an Indian of the Chickasaw Tribe is of such a quantum of blood as to render her land subject to restriction.—Harriss v. Leeper Bros. Lumber Co., 176 P. 412, 74 Okl. 204.

of insolvency[3] or no presumption concerning a person's credit;[4] and it will not be presumed that a person is an infant[5] or under a disability to sue.[6]

§ 142. Marriage and Legitimacy

Presumptions in respect of marriage are discussed in the C.J.S. title Marriage § 43; also 22 C.J. p 145 note 40 [a] (3)–(4), and 38 C.J. p 1322 note 57–p 1330 note 93, while presumptions relating to the legitimacy of children are considered in Bastards § 3.

§ 143. Regularity

In the absence of a contrary showing, the presumption is in favor of the regularity and validity of private transactions.

In the absence of a contrary showing, the presumption is in favor of the regularity and validity of private transactions.[7]

Presumptions as to the regularity of ancient, judicial, and official proceedings are treated in §§ 144–146 infra, while in § 150 infra are considered the presumptions relating to the regularity of corporate acts and proceedings and the regularity of writings generally.

§ 144. Ancient Proceedings

The presumption is in favor of the validity of ancient proceedings.

On proof of a fact so ancient as to suggest inherent difficulty in proving preliminary or attendant facts, all circumstances necessary to its legal validity will be assumed to exist.[8]

However, such a presumption does not arise where the proper evidence consists of records or public documents in the custody of officers charged with their preservation and safe-keeping, unless they are proved to have been lost or destroyed.[9]

§ 145. Judicial Proceedings

Unless the contrary appears, it will generally be presumed that the proceedings of a judicial tribunal are regular and valid and that judicial acts and duties have been and will be duly and regularly performed.

were joined;[57] that a probate court appointing an administrator was informed of the facts;[58] that letters of administration were actually delivered after the administration bond was given, as required by statute;[59] that a probate judge signed the minutes of his court containing an order granting an administrator authority to sell land;[60] that an executor's sale of decedent's property was properly authorized;[61] that a court of probate jurisdiction, in appointing an administrator of the estate of one who died testate, intended that its appointee should be administrator with the will annexed;[62] that in probate proceedings the widow of the testator was cited to elect whether or not she would take under the will, and elected to take the more valuable estate;[63] that a county court, by proper orders, continued a temporary administrator in office so long as was necessary for the purpose of the appointment;[64] that an order for the sale of land of decedent was based on a petition duly filed and presented to the court;[65] that a lunatic was present at the inquest at which he was adjudged insane;[66] that a court was satisfied of the legality of a trust before appointing a trustee;[67] that a guardian was duly and regularly appointed under authority of law,[68] and by reason of his special fitness;[69] that the findings of a court are regular in every respect,[70] and cover all the issues presented at the trial;[71] that a special proceeding for the sale of land was regular;[72] and that in an action to determine the validity of a swamp land maintenance assessment, the court, such being its duty, would have allowed any valid defense to be shown, if presented at any time before judgment, although not pleaded.[73] In aid of a final judgment in partition, the court must assume, if necessary, that the interlocutory finding and order was so modified as to conform to the final judgment.[74] Where an administrator de bonis non is appointed after the discharge of administrators, it will be presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that the order closing the estate was set aside, and the administration legally continued.[75] Where a will named trustees with power to sell, and provided for a substituted trustee on the death of one of the trustees named and the court approved a sale made by the substituted trustee and the other surviving trustees, it must be presumed that the court had before it due proof of the death of such trustee.[76]

On the other hand, there is no presumption as to when an attorney files a paper, or that he has filed it within the time prescribed by statute;[77] and where a court, in ordering deeds to be recorded, never undertook judicially to pass on the validity of such an instrument, the recordation of a conveyance executed by one as attorney for another raises no presumption that a power of attorney was produced.[78] The possession of files by a clerk of court raises no presumption of regularity with respect to a notice filed with him.[79] Whatever the authority of courts of equity to shorten statutes of limitation or destroy causes of action may be, there should be no presumption in favor of the exercise of such authority.[80]

Nature of presumption

The presumption that officers have done their duty is a legal presumption, but does not supply proof of substantial facts.—U. S. v. Ross, Ct. Cl., 92 U S. 281, 23 L.Ed. 707.

Foreign law

(1) It is presumed that officer enforcing liability of person of sister state proceeded according to law of that state.—Duke v. Olson, 240 Ill. App. 198.

(2) In absence of proof to the contrary, it is presumed that official act of officer in another state has been performed as required by law of that state.—Lummus Cotton Gin Co. v. Arnold, 269 S.W. 706, 151 Tenn. 540.

Obedience to orders of court

"Courts will not assume that public officers will act dishonestly or dishonorably, or use their public trust for private ends, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, officers will be presumed to have acted in the exercise of their powers in the interests of the public and within the authority granted them."—Stocker v. City of Richmond Hights, Mo.App., 132 S.W.2d 1116, 1118.

Refusal of information by government officer

The presumption obtains that in the exercise of the authority to refuse information deemed necessary in the prosecution of a suit against the United States, the officers of the government have acted in good faith, especially in the absence of any proof that their action has been exercised arbitrarily, capriciously, or with intent to injure the plaintiffs.—Pollen v. U. S., 85 Ct.Cl. 673.

Every reasonable supposition is indulged in favor of the honesty of purpose of public officers.—Universal Mach. Co. v. Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission, 16 N.E.2d 53, 301 Mass. 40—Morrison v. Selectmen of Town of Weymouth, 181 N.E. 786, 279 Mass. 486.

exercise of a sound judgment or discretion,[96] for the purpose of promoting the public good and protecting the public interest.[97]

Officers of former government. The general presumption in favor of the validity of official acts applies to the acts of officers of a former government.[98]

Official act not questioned. The inference of regularity acquires additional force where persons whose interests are adversely affected by an official act do not question its validity for a long period.[99]

In favor of individuals or officer. The presumption is available to sustain the regularity of official acts in favor of individuals who rely thereon,[1] and may also be relied on by the officer himself where it is sought to hold him liable for failure to perform or to perform properly a duty imposed on him.[2]

b. Qualifications of Rule

The general rule as to the presumption of regularity of official acts or duties is subject to qualifications with respect to when, and the extent to which, it obtains, and as to its being rebuttable.

The general presumption that an official act or duty has been regularly performed is subject to qualifications.[3] It generally is indulged only where the legality of an official act is questioned collaterally,[4] and not where it is directly attacked[5] or where a question of jurisdiction is involved.[6] The presumption also applies only where a duty is imposed on an official to act in a certain way,[7] and assumes that the law tells him what his duties are;[8] and therefore the presumption that an officer will discharge his duties according to law does not apply where his duties are not specified by law and he is given unlimited discretion.[9] The extent to which the presumption shall obtain in a particular case is generally to be determined by the court from the facts and circumstances as shown by the pleadings and proof.[10]

The presumption cannot be used as a substitute for proof of a definite and material fact,[11] such as substantive independent facts essential to establish an issue;[12] neither can the presumption be used as a basis for presuming irregularity in another act by the same[13] or a different[14] officer; nor will it avail to supply a fact which the official record affirmatively shows to be absent,[15] or which is required to be a matter of record;[16] nor, in the absence of other evidence, will the presumption prevail over an official record to the contrary.[17] The presumption cannot be indulged to the extent of supplying the necessary authority for an act,[18] or to sustain official action where the mandatory requirements of a statute concerning such action are wholly disregarded,[19] or to show that the other party to the transaction properly performed certain authorized acts on his part.[20] The rule that one presumption cannot be based on another, stated supra § 116, precludes using the presumption that one officer has

c. Applications of Rule to Particular Officers or Bodies

The presumption of regularity applies to the official acts and proceedings of individual officers and of official boards and legislative bodies.

The presumption of regularity is not confined to the acts of individual officers but applies also to the acts of boards,[31] such as administrative boards or bodies,[32] and to acts of legislative bodies.[33]

Among the numerous classes of officers or official bodies in favor of whose acts a presumption of regularity has been entertained are the following: Administrative officers;[34] administrators or executors;[35] an alcalde in territory formerly governed by Spanish law;[36] an alderman;[37] an appraiser;[38]

Making appointments

(1) The court will assume that the governor, making appointments to public office, intended only to do what he was authorized to do by the statutes and constitution.—People v. Scott, 120 P. 126, 52 Colo. 59.

(2) The court should presume that governor would choose honest, intelligent, and competent commissioners to sit on industrial commission, and that he would exercise power of removal of commissioners not possessing such qualification.—Ison v. Western Vegetable Distributors, 59 P.2d 649, 48 Ariz. 104.

Reason for action

When authority is vested in governor to act for certain reason, and he does act, assigning such reason, existence thereof is conclusively presumed, unless statute provides for its judicial determination.—Lee v. Morley, 247 P. 178, 79 Colo. 481.

Veto

Summary sale for taxes is not presumed regular and proper, but com-

as to extra official[15] proceedings, the party claiming under them must make strict proof of the performance of every prerequisite of the law. Neither does the presumption extend to acts involving the forfeiture of an individual's rights, the depriving him of his property, or the placing of a charge or lien thereon.[16]

Among the acts in respect to which the presumption of regularity has been applied may be mentioned administrative rules and regulations;[17] the administering of an oath or affirmation;[18] the appropriation or expenditure of public funds;[19] the conduct of judicial sales;[20] the designation of official newspapers;[21] the dismissal of a civil service employee;[22] the drawing of grand juries;[23] the Effect of void adjudication of insanity

It will be presumed that an adjudication of insanity was made under the only statute then in effect authorizing it; and, where such statute was determined to be unconstitutional, the presumption of sanity continued to attach.—Torres v. Gersdorff, Tex.Civ.App., 287 S.W. 668, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds Gersdorff v. Torres, Com.App., 293 S.W. 560.

One who has notice of a party's unsoundness of mind cannot rely on the presumption of sanity.—Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Henby, 97 N.E. 313, 178 Ind. 239.

Presumption of sanity is one of law, as distinguished from a presumption of fact, and hence will not be considered as evidence.—Laventhal v. New York Life Ins. Co., D. C Mo., 40 F.Supp. 157.

ordinary or reasonable judgment,[46] and discretion,[47] and is competent to transact ordinary business.[48] Conversely, there is no presumption of insanity[49] or incompetency,[50] or of lack of ordinary reason and firmness.[51]

Effect of age or physical disability or infirmity. While it has been held that a child under seven years of age is presumed incapable of appreciating and avoiding danger,[52] neither old age[53] nor extreme weakness of body[54] raises a presumption of unsoundness of mind. In the early history of the law a person born deaf and dumb was presumed to be an idiot,[55] although such presumption was rebuttable[56] by proof of understanding.[57] The modern doctrine, however, is that the fact that a person is deaf and dumb does not raise a presumption of idiocy[58] or insanity,[59] although it has also been held that a person who is not only deaf and dumb, but blind, would be considered in law as incapable of any understanding.[60]

Effect of suicide. While the fact of suicide of a person may properly be considered on the question of his sanity, as appears in the C.J.S. title Insane Persons § 5, also 32 C.J. p 759 note 63, the presumption of sanity is not rebutted by such fact,[61] nor does such fact alone raise a presumption of insanity,[62] although the suicide was immediately preceded by irrational acts.[63] A fortiori, an attempt at or threat of suicide will not destroy the presumption of sanity.[64]

§ 148. Sending and Delivery of Telegrams

A telegram is presumed to have been properly delivered by the telegraph company where it was properly addressed and delivered to the company for transmission, and charges were paid.

It is presumed that a telegram reached its destination,[65] and that it was received by the addressee,[66] where, but only where, it is shown that the message was properly addressed,[67] and delivered to a telegraph company for transmission,[68] and that the charges for its transmission were paid.[69] It has also been held that there is no presumption of delivery to the addressee unless there is proof that the message was received by the telegraph office to which it was directed.[70] The presumption of delivery of a telegram is, perhaps, weaker at the outset than the presumption of regular delivery of mail matter,[71] but it becomes strong and convincing where the addressee has an opportunity to deny the receipt of the message, and fails to do so.[72] The presumption of receipt of a telegram is rebuttable,[73] cannot be indulged in an action by a telegraph company to recover its charges,[74] and has been held inapplicable to a cablegram addressed to a place in a foreign country, during the existence of a world war.[75]

§ 149. Virility of Men

Men are presumed capable of sexual intercourse and of procreation regardless of advanced age.

It is presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary that a male person of mature years is capable of sexual intercourse,[76] and of procreation,[77] even though he has reached a very advanced age.[78]

by the governing body of a corporation was in good faith;[85] that a private business corporation has officers and stockholders;[86] that the directors were elected by all of the stockholders, who in so doing acted in their own interest;[87] and that a public sale of corporate property realized its reasonable value.[88] Further, it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that grants beneficial to the corporation have been accepted;[89] and that a corporate seal attached to an instrument signed by the secretary is the seal of the corporation.[90]

On the other hand, in the absence of contrary evidence, it will not be presumed that a corporation has acted or will act illegally.[91] The courts may not presume that stockholders will exercise their voting right in a manner otherwise than that which they think conducive to the best interests of the corporation.[92]

Dividends. In the absence of contrary evidence, it will be presumed that dividends were declared out of earnings,[93] and that the capital stock was not impaired by the declaration of a dividend.[94]

neck v. Village of Mamaroneck, 135 N.E. 933, 233 N.Y. 598, and affirmed Town of Mamaroneck v. Baker, 135 N.E. 962, 233 N.Y. 666—H. R. Moch Co. v. Ind.—Davis v. Steele, 146 N.E. 425,

With respect to railroads, it will be presumed that the railroad and its appurtenances are constructed and maintained according to law;[96] that in appropriating land for its right of way the company appropriated the full width authorized by law;[97] that trains running on a railroad track are operated by the owner of the track,[98] unless the name of a different company is marked on the train, in which case the presumption is that it is operated by the company whose name it bears;[99] that trains were operated in compliance with the schedules[1] and arrived at about the usual time;[2] that charges for things essential to the operation of the railroad represent economical expenditures;[3] that tariff schedules posted in the offices of the road are identical with those filed with the interstate commerce commission;[4] and that a report required by statute to be made by railroad companies to the auditor of public accounts for purposes of taxation, and for failure to make which a severe penalty is imposed, was made as required.[5]

With respect to street railroads, it will be presumed that cars running on its tracks are operated by it,[6] and that a company which has mortgaged its franchise obtained the necessary consent of the city which granted the franchise.[7]

Municipal corporation. A municipal corporation is presumed to have been incorporated under the general laws rather than under special legislation.[8] The presumption that a city will do its duty far outweighs the conjecture that it will do otherwise.[9]

Corporate books and records. In the absence of contrary evidence, it is to be implied that a corporation kept records of its doings,[10] and it is presumed that such records are correct and regular.[11]

(2) Acts of Directors, Officers, and Agents

In the absence of a contrary showing, the acts of corporate directors and officers are presumed to be regular and to have been performed in good faith.

In the absence of contrary evidence, the presumption is in favor of the fairness, good faith, and regularity of acts of corporate directors and officers.[12] It will be presumed that the directors have managed

Resolution authorizing execution of deed or mortgage

If a corporation passes a resolution authorizing its president and secretary to execute a deed or mortgage of its property, the natural and legitimate presumption will be either that a record was made of the same by the secretary in a book containing the proceedings of the corporation, or else that the paper containing such resolution was retained and preserved by the secretary, or both.—Mullanphy Sav. Bank v. Schott, 26 N.E. 640, 135 Ill. 655, 25 Am.S.R. 401.

Presumption arising from absence of record

In suit by school district's grantee, who claimed to be owner of sewer located in city street, to enjoin abutting owner from using sewer, where there was no record that school district which had installed sewer had been granted permit by city, it is presumed that no permit was granted by anyone having authority to grant it.—Cornwall v. Date of entry

In the absence of contrary evidence, it must be presumed that in accordance with statutory directions resolutions of the board of public works ordering improvements were entered on the minute book of the board on the day the improvements were ordered.—Vaughan v. Vaughan, 6 Tenn.App. 354.

Nature of corporate action accepted as true

Nature of corporate action as described in votes of stockholders and directors is commonly accepted as true.—Willson v. Laconia Car Co., 176 N.E. 182, 275 Mass. 435—Dodge v. Commissioner of Corporations and Taxation, 174 N.E. 109, 273 Mass. 187.

Presumption as to incorrectness the affairs of the corporation;[13] and that the directors, or officers[14] and agents[15] have performed their duties in a regular manner.

There is no presumption ordinarily that corporate directors or officers violated their duty or committed a breach of trust.[16] However, where directors stand presently to benefit by a given result, the presumption that their votes were fairly and honestly cast in good faith for the best interests of the corporation disappears.[17]

b. Health and Physical Condition

The presumption is that persons possess ordinary human faculties and are normal as to health and the natural functions of the body and organs.

In the absence of contrary evidence, it will be presumed that persons possess ordinary human faculties,[18] and are normal as to health[19] and the natural functions of the body and organs.[20] Likewise,

Presumptions as to:

Capacity for childbearing see supra § 121.

Sanity and mental capacity see supra § 147.

Virility of men see supra § 149.

Injured person

It is probably a fair presumption that a person injured was at the time in possession of his usual faculties and able to care for himself.—Brown v. Union Pac. R. Co., 106 P. 1001, 81 Kan. 701, 29 L.R.A.,N.S., 808.

it will be presumed that all persons will be similarly affected by certain physical conditions.[21]

However, human beings are not sufficiently alike to warrant the presumption that when a drug produces a certain effect on one person, it will, to a certain extent, similarly affect another, taking into account age, strength, and other conditions present.[22]

c. Knowledge of Facts

A party is presumed to know, or is chargeable with knowledge of, matters, such as the contents of an instrument, which he had an opportunity of knowing and should know.

As a general rule, a party is presumed to know, or is chargeable with knowledge of, matters which he had the opportunity of knowing and should know.[23] Thus in the absence of contrary evidence,

Sight

Railroad engineers must be presumed to have eyes at least as good as those of the average person.—Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Henderson, 111 S.E. 277, 132 Va. 297.

Strength

A grown-up man is presumed to be of ordinary strength.—Egge v. Haglund, 179 N.W. 491, 43 S.D. 382.

written instrument which he prepared.[37] Further, it is presumed that a person receiving a written instrument in the transaction of business,[38] as, for example, the purchaser of a bond[39] or the recipient of an insurance policy,[40] is acquainted with its contents.

However, the presumption that a person signing a written instrument has knowledge of its contents does not arise where fraud or imposition is shown,[41] or where, in the case of a written contract, no contractual relations are assumed by reason of the execution of the instrument.[42]

d. Making, Validity, and Genuineness of Writings

The presumption is in favor of the correctness, genuineness, validity, and regularity of writings.

Various presumptions may arise in respect of the making, validity, and genuineness of writings.[43] Generally, the presumption is in favor of the cor-

Particular presumptions held proper

(1) That parties intended to make a reasonable and rational contract.—Irwin v. Baggett, 164 So. 745, 231 Ala. 324.

(2) That parties thought that they had fully set forth their agreement.—Kurland v. Massachusetts Amusement Corporation, 29 N.E.2d 749, 307 Mass. 131.

(3) That note payable in dollars represented all of transaction, in so far as the medium of payment was concerned.—C. & J. Camp v. Miller, D.C.Fla., 300 F. 579.

rectness,[44] genuineness,[45] validity,[46] and regularity[47] of writings.

Unless the contrary appears from the evidence or findings,[48] it will be presumed that a written instrument was executed on the day of its date[49] and at the place where it purports to be dated;[50] that a written instrument which is in the possession of the promisee or grantee was duly delivered[51] on the day of its date;[52] and that instruments executed on different dates are separate and distinct, and not parts of the same transaction.[53] It will also be presumed that a person capable of writing will sign his name wherever his signature is required, rather than procure it to be done by others;[54] and that a person who signed his name with

(4) That a set of books showing gross receipts and expenditures was kept—Morrow v. Missouri Pac. R Co., 123 S.W. 1034, 140 Mo.App. 200.

(5) That book entries were properly authorized—Henry v. Travelers' Ins. Co., C.C.Colo, 42 F. 363.

(6) That an affidavit in support of a motion for a continuance was filed by the authority of the person in whose behalf it professes to be made and at whose request the continuance was granted.—Stone v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 90 P. 251, 75 Kan. 600.

(7) That a copy of an abstract of title, certified in the name of a firm and in the handwriting of one of the members of the firm, was certified during the existence of the partnership.—Teninga v. Glos, 107 N. E. 125, 266 Ill. 94.

Recital as to payment of consideration
Where bill of sale and lease physically annexed thereto recited payment of two thousand dollars to defendant by plaintiffs' decedent, presumption arises therefrom that such consideration had been received by defendant.—Walsh v. Gray, 212 N.Y. S. 230, 214 App.Div. 296.

Private books of partner
Presumption of correctness, which, as between partners, attaches to entries in partnership books to which all partners have access, does not, however, attach to entries in private books of one of partners, which entries must be established by extrinsic proof.—Riley v. Brown, 237 P 833, 72 Cal.App. 468.

County of attesting witness
Written instrument is presumably executed in county of official witness attesting it.—Smith v. Simmons, 133 S.E. 312, 35 Ga.App. 427.

Place of enforcement
Until the contrary appears, a chattel mortgage is presumed to have been executed in the state where it sought to be enforced.—Casner v. Hoskins, 128 P. 841, 130 P. 55, 64 Or. 254.

a cross mark was illiterate and could not read.[55]

There is no presumption that instruments made on the same date but between different parties were executed simultaneously.[56]

e. Morality and Rightful Action; Performance of Duty

The law presumes morality and rightful action, and that every person performs his duties.

The law presumes morality[57] and rightful action,[58] and it will not be presumed that a person acted immorally[59] or wrongfully.[60]

Performance of duty. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption is that every person performs his duties.[61]

However, it has been held that there is no presumption of performance of a private duty;[62] and the mere making of an obligation does not create a presumption that the obligation has been performed.[63] The presumption in favor of the performance of a duty on the part of an agent does not obtain where it is shown that the agent acted as an individual and not in his fiduciary capacity.[64]

f. Ownership and Value

Various presumptions may arise in respect of ownership and value, such as presumptions relating to the value of notes, stocks, and bonds.

Evidence consistent with presence or absence of wrongdoing

Where evidence is capable of interpretation equally consistent with presence or absence of wrongful act, that meaning must be ascribed which accords with its absence.—Lahr v. Tirrill, 8 N.E.2d 298, 274 N.Y. 112, reversing 291 N.Y.S. 269, 249 App.Div. 667, reargument denied 10 N.E.2d 575, 274 N.Y. 611—Digelormo v. Conduct corresponding with truth

As against himself, it is to be presumed that a person's conduct corresponds with the truth.—Wiener v. Crystal Oil Refining Corporation, 165 So. 131, 183 La. 879.

Long silence as indicating fairness

Long silence on the part of the complaining party gives rise to a presumption of fair dealing.—In re Early's Estate, 182 N.Y.S. 537, 12 Misc. 54, affirmed 185 N.Y.S. 926, 195 App.Div. 889.

Patriotic society

It will be presumed that a patriotic society will perform its legal duties.—Conley v. Daughters of Republic, 156 S.W. 197, 157 S.W. 937, 106 Tex. 80.

Recording mortgage

Where it is a person's legal duty to record a mortgage, the court will not assume that he will violate that duty.—Aaron v. Bayon, 59 So. 130, 131 La. 228.

62. Conn.—Miles v. Sherman, 166 A. 250, 116 Conn. 678.
Presumption as to performance of official duty see supra § 146.

Publication of order

Where court ordered defendant purchaser of property to publish order of court discharging receivers and fixing limit for making of claims against receivers, it will not be presumed that defendant complied with such order, especially since the knowledge of such fact was peculiarly in defendant's possession, and it did not supply proof thereof at trial.—Carroll v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., Mo.App., 274 S.W. 837.

63. S.C.—Sibley v. Sibley, 70 S.E. 615, 88 S.C. 184, Ann.Cas 1912C 1170.
22 C.J. p 107 note 62.

64. Tex.—Reynolds v. Reynolds, Civ.App., 224 S.W. 382.

Various presumptions may arise in connection with ownership and value.[65] Thus, in the absence of contrary evidence, it will be presumed that one named as consignee in a bill of lading is the owner of the consigned goods;[66] that the owner of land is entitled to the crops thereon;[67] that the declared plaintiff in an action is the owner of a judgment obtained therein;[68] that one whose number plates appear on a motor vehicle is its owner;[69] and that the builder of a vessel is the owner.[70]

Unless a contrary showing is made, it will be presumed that the price paid for property at a bona fide sale represents its value.[71] Further, it will be presumed that an obligation,[72] such as a promissory note[73] or bond[74] is worth its par or face value; and while it has been held that no such presumption exists in respect of the value of shares of capital stock,[75] there is some authority apparently to the contrary.[76]

g. Miscellaneous Matters

Presumptions have arisen as to a number of miscel-

65. U.S.—Birge-Forbes Co. v. Heye, Tex., 40 S.Ct. 160, 251 U.S. 317, 64 L.Ed. 286, affirming, D.C., 248 F. 636.

Manager of business as owner
Where a business was conducted in the name of "Main 203 Tire Service," a presumption that the person managing the business was its owner was not warranted.—Hutchins v. Mendenhall, 253 Ill.App. 248.

Recognition of ownership as showing lawful acquisition
Recognition by cemetery authorities of ownership creates presumption that ownership was acquired in accordance with rules of association, and such presumption continues in absence of evidence to overcome it, or of evidence that ownership which association recognized had terminated.—In re St. Vincent de Paul Benev. Ass'n of New Orleans, La.App., 175 So. 140.

Purchase outside state as evidence of value
The fact that a buyer in Indiana was buying beans in California for shipment to Indiana is presumptive evidence that the value of the beans in Indiana was higher than that in California.—Humphry v. Farmers' Union & Milling Co., 190 P. 489, 47 Cal.App. 211.

Restrictions on use of property as affecting value
There is no presumption that restrictions against using land for slaughter house purposes, etc., made property less valuable.—Noethinger v. Jeffries, 177 N.Y.S. 577, 108 Misc. 372.

Public sale
(1) In the absence of contrary evidence, the presumption is that the price secured at a public auction sale made on usual terms is the highest and best obtainable and represents the value of the article sold.
Cal.—Boyd v. Benneyan, 266 P. 278, 204 Cal. 23.
N.J.—Wieters v. Hart, 63 A. 241, 67 N.J.Eq. 507, affirmed 64 A. 1135, 68 N.J.Eq. 796.
Pa.—Plummer v. Wilson, 185 A. 311, 322 Pa. 118.

(2) No such presumption may be drawn, however, where the great weight of the evidence shows that the property was worth almost twice as much as it brought at the sale.—Gibson v. People, 122 Ill.App. 217.

Purchase price paid in other property
Where portion of purchase price of personalty is paid in other property at agreed valuation, presumption, at least prima facie, is that such valuation is actual value thereof.—Evankovich v. Howard Pierce, Inc., 8 P.2d 653, 91 Mont. 344.

Price paid for repairs, nothing appearing to cast suspicion on the transaction, is presumptive evidence of the value of the repairs.—Cloyes v. Plaatje, 231 Ill.App. 183.

laneous matters, such as presumptions which relate to bonds, checks, deeds, drafts, notes and to the government and law enforcement.

In addition to the presumptions considered supra this section and supra §§ 120–149, infra §§ 151–157, various other presumptions may or may not be proper, depending on the circumstances of the individual case.[77] Thus in the absence of contrary evidence, it will be presumed that a person paid the legal rate of interest[78] or the market price;[79] that money paid by one person to another was due to the latter;[80] that credit was given to a known principal rather than to an agent;[81] that a person lending money on a borrower's promise to repay is not indebted to the borrower;[82] that a fund for the benefit of persons holding debts of unequal amounts was intended to be distributed proportionately;[83] and that a person rendering services in his calling, trade, or profession, did so for a compensation to be paid him.[84]

In addition, it will be presumed that all of the property of a business corporation is useful in its business;[85] that goods were delivered pursuant to an order for delivery thereof found in the possession of the person on whom such order was drawn;[86] that a delivery wagon is operated by the person, firm, or corporation, whose business name appears thereon;[87] and that a probated will and instruments involved in the partition of an estate thereunder are recorded.[88]

takes ordinary care of his own concerns;[89] that a person possessing good eyesight must have seen that which was within the range of his vision, if he gave attention and looked,[90] and that he did not look if he failed to see what he should have seen;[91] that a person believes in the fundamental principles of the church to which he belongs;[92] that a drafted soldier was honorably discharged;[93] that a person who was discharged from an insane asylum and thereafter resided at home undisturbed was normally sane at the time of his discharge and continued so;[94] and that decedent had no property subject to administration, where no administration was had in any county of the state.[95]

There is also a presumption that a representation shown to have been made is true;[96] that things shown to have been done were lawfully and duly done;[97] that a letter or statement received by a person was in his possession at the time of trial;[98] that a letter addressed to a party outside the state is in the possession of the person to whom it was addressed;[99] and that a reference to a month means a month of the current year.[1]

On the other hand, it will not be presumed that a bid given to a stranger to the contract was delivered;[2] that an officer is to receive a salary;[3] or that a person would refuse to obey a peremptory writ of mandamus directed to him.[4] No inference of nonpayment or subsisting indebtedness can be drawn from evidence showing that at one time money had been received for the use of another.[5]

Presumptions relating to bonds, checks, drafts, and notes. It will be presumed, in the absence of contrary evidence, that a bond filed in conformity to statutory requirements was approved as required by statute;[6] that a check was given in payment of a debt or for money received at the time;[7] that a draft will be accepted and honored on due presentation;[8] that payment of drafts was made from funds of the drawer in the hands of the drawee;[9] that a promissory note evidences a debt from the maker to the payee,[10] and that the payee was not indebted to the maker;[11] that a note for a certain amount and credit on the maker's books for the same amount represent different items of indebtedness;[12] that an overdue note in possession of the maker is paid;[13] and that a note was paid on the day when the debt evidenced thereby was due.[14]

However, it will not be presumed that an officer of a trust company who aided the holder of an accommodation note in negotiating the same intended to defraud the company;[15] that funds deposited in bank on check account remained any length of time;[16] or that a bank, after disclaiming any interest in, or right to, a judgment on a note which had been assigned to it only as collateral for a debt which was later paid, would attempt to assign the judgment.[17]

Presumptions relating to deeds and realty. Unless the contrary is shown by the evidence, it will be presumed that everyone examines the title to real estate before purchasing or receiving a mortgage;[18] that a person to whom a deed conveying land was executed purchased the premises with his own money[19] and voluntarily;[20] that restrictions in a deed are inserted for the benefit of grantor's remaining lands;[21] that lot owners are interested in streets and alleys on a recorded plat;[22] and that sidewalks are normally free from obstructions and pitfalls.[23]

Presumptions relating to government and law enforcement. In a proper case it will be presumed that all laws will be enforced[24] and that legal infractions will be prosecuted;[25] that the government is always ready to pay what it owes;[26] that a sovereign state dealing with a citizen intends to apply the same rules of abstract justice that it applies in actions between citizens;[27] that the supreme court of another state is a court of record and hence has a seal;[28] that the signers of an initiative petition are registered electors;[29] and that a congressional township is a full, rather than a fractional township.[30]

On the other hand, it will not be presumed that one state would attempt to exercise the police power of another state;[31] that a seal used by the secretary of a territory in certifying a public record is the great seal of the territory;[32] or that a contract let by county commissioners without advertising for bids involves the incurring of a liability greater than may be incurred without such advertising.[33]

Presumptions relating to newspapers. In the absence of a contrary showing, it will be presumed that a newspaper was published at or before the time of its date.[34] However, it will not be presumed that the word "Daily" is a part of the name of a newspaper merely because it is published daily.[35]

Presumptions relating to witnesses. In the absence of contrary evidence, it is presumed that witnesses are interviewed before trial[36] and that they speak the truth.[37]

§ 151. Presumptions Arising from Spoliation, Fabrication, or Nonproduction of Evidence

Presumptions arising from spoliation, fabrication or nonproduction of evidence are discussed infra §§ 152–156. Admissions arising from attempts to suppress evidence see § 293 infra.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 152. Spoliation in General

The spoliation of evidence gives rise to inferences or presumptions unfavorable to the spoliator.

The maxim, Omnia præsumuntur contra spoliatorem, "all things are presumed against a wrongdoer," has been frequently applied to unfavorable inferences or presumptions arising from the spoliation of evidence,[38] and, so far as it rests on logic, is

Presumption as rebuttable
The presumption that witnesses speak the truth may be overcome by any matters indicating they are not worthy of credit.—U. S. v. One 1939 Cadillac Two-Passenger Coupe, Motor No. 8291842, License No. NJ-MH-27-V, D.C.N.J., 36 F.Supp. 847 reinforced by the proposition that men do not as a rule withhold from a tribunal facts beneficial to themselves.[39] In practical administration, however, courts have, under a natural feeling of resentment at double dealing or bad faith, at times imposed penalties which, however justified by this feeling or by considerations of public policy, go beyond the natural and logical effect of the situation.[40]

The presumption contra spoliatorem does not justify the substitution of mere allegation or conjecture for proof,[41] or arbitrarily overthrow a contention clearly established by evidence;[42] but its legitimate effect is confined to rendering evidence admissible which could not be received under ordinary circumstances, or giving to the evidence of the party claiming the benefit of the presumption the strongest construction in his favor that it will reasonably bear.[43] A spoliator of evidence cannot be deprived of his legal rights by the exclusion of other and totally independent evidence offered by him.[44]

§ 153. Destruction of Evidence

The destruction, mutilation, or alteration of evidence without satisfactory explanation gives rise to an inference unfavorable to the spoliator.

The unexplained[45] and deliberate destruction of relevant,[46] documentary,[47] or other[48] evidence, or the mutilation or alteration of such evidence,[49] gives rise to an inference that the matter destroyed or mutilated is unfavorable to the spoliator.

The inference arising from the destruction of evidence ordinarily will not dispense with the necessity for the introduction by the other party of some secondary evidence as to the contents of the document to prove facts which such party claims would have been shown thereby;[50] it merely diminishes the force of the spoliator's evidence[51] and enhances the probative value of that adduced by his opponent.[52] The inference cannot operate when

Inference as substitute for evidence

"The presumption . . . does not take the place of evidence, but is regarded as merely matter of inference in weighing the evidence applicable to the question in dispute."—Ellis J. Gomez & Co. v. Hartwell, 122 A. 461, 464, 97 Vt. 147.

22 C.J. p 110 note 29.

there is positive evidence of the contents of the instrument destroyed,[53] and it is, like other inferences, ordinarily rebuttable by satisfactory explanation.[54] However, as appears infra § 293, the spoliation of documentary evidence by a party has been held to be equivalent to an admission of the truth of the other party's allegations, and it has been stated that, where the instrument destroyed was of such nature as to destroy all evidence and the destruction was willful, there follows a conclusive presumption that if produced it would have established the claim of the other party.[55]

An unfavorable inference can arise only against one who actually destroyed or was privy to the destruction of the evidence,[56] and only in cases where the destruction or mutilation was in bad faith for the purpose of suppressing evidence.[57] No unfavorable inference arises where the evidence was lost, destroyed, or mutilated by accident or without the fault of the party in possession of it.[58]

§ 154. Eloignment of Witness or Evidence

Where a party eloigns witnesses or evidence, an inference unfavorable to such party arises.

Where a party eloigns witnesses[59] by removing them beyond the reach of process[60] or dissuading them from attendance,[61] or attempts to do so,[62] or removes or conceals relevant documents[63] or portions thereof,[64] or articles which are material to the controversy,[65] an inference arises that the evidence thus kept out of the case would be highly prejudicial to him.

However, the flight or disappearance of an adverse witness does not raise any inference against a party who is not shown to have procured or connived at the same.[66]

§ 155. Fabrication of Evidence

The fabrication of evidence gives rise to an inference unfavorable to the fabricator.

The fabrication of evidence raises a presumption or, more properly, an inference that the truth, if disclosed, would be detrimental to the interest of the party who has been guilty of such an improper act.[67] Such an inference is created whether the evidence fabricated is documentary[68] or oral,[69] including the exercise of improper influence on witnesses.[70]

Where evidence is vague and uncertain, the presumption will prevail.—Waters v. Lawler, 130 N.E. 335, 297 Ill. 63.

Evidence of an attempt to intimi-

The probative effect of the inference is in proportion to the effort made and risk incurred in manufacturing the false evidence,[71] and the inference is particularly strong where the fabricator has delayed asserting his claim for a long time and until after the death of the party against whom it is asserted.[72] Nevertheless, the inference cannot prevail where other evidence in the case establishes the allegations of the fabricator.[73]

§ 156. Suppression or Withholding of Evidence

a. In general
b. Nonproduction of documents or other real evidence
c. Failure to call or examine witnesses
d. Failure of party to testify
e. Exclusion of privileged communication

a. In General

The unexplained failure or refusal of a party to produce evidence, or the most satisfactory evidence, in his possession, or to submit to a physical examination, may give rise to an adverse inference.

The unexplained[74] failure or refusal of a party to produce evidence may, under certain circumstances, and sometimes as a result of statute, give rise to an inference unfavorable to such party.[75] In the absence of explanation, the failure or re-date or influence a witness is not admissible, in the absence of a showing that the opposite party is connected therewith.

Duty to disclose evidence

"Peculiar knowledge or possession of evidence carries with it the duty of giving it out if one would avoid the imputation that its concealment naturally reflects."—Southwest Cotton Co. v. Clements, 213 P. 1005, 1008, 25 Ariz. 124, rehearing denied 215 P. 156, 25 Ariz. 169.

Facts within knowledge of adversary

Where act complained of was one defendant would reasonably be expected to account for and plaintiff would not be, there was no room for the assumption that, if evidence for defendant was not true, plaintiff would have denied it.—Shedlock v. Wyoming Valley Autobus Co., 17 A. 2d 384, 340 Pa. 377.

"Presumption of evasion or concealment"

"In civil cases it may be a duty on the part of either party to the cause where he has evidence in his power and within his reach by which he may repel a claim or charge against him, to produce, or suffer the presumption that the charge or claim is well founded. This rule applies irrespective of the burden of proof. The failure to so produce may give rise to the suggestion or presumption of evasion or concealment."—Shiver & Barnett v. Firemens Ins. proof fails to establish a prima facie case, no presumption arises from the failure of the other party to introduce evidence peculiarly within his knowledge.[83] Where defendant introduces no evidence, but submits the case on plaintiff's evidence, no presumption unfavorable to defendant arises from his failure to produce evidence peculiarly within his knowledge and possession.[84]

Failure to produce most satisfactory evidence. Where it is apparent that a party has the power to produce evidence of a more explicit, direct, and satisfactory character than that which he does introduce and relies on, it may be presumed that if the more satisfactory evidence had been given it would have been detrimental to him and would have laid open deficiencies in, and objections to, his case which the more obscure and uncertain evidence did not disclose.[85]

Refusal to submit to physical examination. A party's refusal to submit to a physical examination in an action involving personal injuries to him justifies an inference that such examination would disclose that the injuries are less serious than is claimed.[86]

Extent of proof required

Where the evidence adduced by the proponent tends to fix liability on his adversary in the sense that under the practice prevailing the case would have to be submitted to a jury if there were one, even though it falls short under the quality and quantum that would entitle him to a decree or judgment as a matter of right, it is sufficient to invoke the rule that if it be within the power of defendant to rebut the unfavorable inference, from the evidence so offered by his opponent, and he fails to do so, it may be inferred from facts shown that the fully developed evidence would tend to establish liability.—Pickard v. Berryman, Tenn.App., 142 S.W.2d 764.

Inability to produce better evidence

Failure to consult physician

Where no physician is called to treat injured person, although many physicians are available, and extent of injury would depend largely on physician's testimony, inference is warranted that injured person would have called physician had injuries been serious.—Beard v. Williams, 161 So. 750, 172 Miss. 880.

Refusal to permit autopsy

Refusal by wife to permit autopsy on body of deceased husband after it had been buried, based on the ground that after the preparation of the body for the burial it would not determine the cause of death, did not raise a legal presumption as to the cause of death.—Vulcan Detinning Co. v. Industrial Commission, 128 N.E. 917, 295 Ill. 141.

tion or inference arising from the withholding of evidence is not conclusive against the party, but is merely a fact for the consideration of the jury; and such failure cannot be relied on by the other party as affirmative proof of facts as to which the burden of proof is on him.[87] The presumption or inference not only strengthens the probative force of the other party's proof,[88] but is, itself, of certain probative force.[89] It may turn the scale where the evidence is closely balanced.[90]

b. Nonproduction of Documents or Other Real Evidence

An unfavorable inference may result from the unexplained failure of a party to produce documentary or other real evidence, especially after the other party has given notice to produce.

The unexplained failure or refusal of a party to judicial proceedings to produce relevant and competent documentary evidence[91] or an article which would tend to throw light on the issues[92] authorizes, under certain circumstances, an inference or a presumption unfavorable to such party.

Possession or control of such evidence by the party against whom the inference or presumption is sought to be invoked, is necessary;[93] the rule does not apply where the evidence is equally available to both parties.[94] Further, it must appear that there has been an actual suppression or withholding of the evidence;[95] no unfavorable inference arises where the circumstances indicate that the document or article in question has been lost or accidentally destroyed,[96] or where the failure to produce it is otherwise properly accounted for.[97]

Notice to produce. The unfavorable inference resulting from the nonproduction of documents or other real evidence is especially applicable where the party withholding the evidence has had notice or has been ordered to produce it.[98]

According to some cases, unless the party desiring the production of documentary or other real evidence gives notice to the party in whose possession it is to produce it, no unfavorable presumption or inference can arise from its nonproduction,[99] although it has been held that when writings are proper matters in defense or when the adverse party must have understood that they must necessarily have come into question, notice to produce them may be dispensed with;[1] and some authorities have expressly ruled that no notice to produce is necessary to justify the inference.[2]

Weight of inference. Inferences from the suppression of documents or failure to produce them on notice increase the weight of evidence produced by the other party as to the contents of the documents, or as to the facts to which the documents are relevant, but do not constitute independent evidence of a fact.[3]

c. Failure to Call or Examine Witnesses

The unexplained failure of a party to call or examine an available witness who possesses peculiar knowledge may give rise to an inference that the testimony of such witness would not sustain the contention of the party.

The failure of a party to call a witness may, under some circumstances, and sometimes as a result of express statutory regulation, give rise to an inference that the testimony of such uninterrogated witness would not sustain the contention of the party.[4] In the absence of explanation, the failure

Credibility
The fact that a party could not produce a receipt which she claimed to have received did not affect her legal rights, but only her credibility. —Salvaggio v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 80 Pa.Super. 594.

Inference of hostility
A jury was not entitled to infer, from failure of defendant to produce documents under its control, that, if produced, the documents would be hostile to defendant.—Maurer v. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co., 300 N.Y.S. 646, 164 Misc. 717, reversing 298 N.Y.S. 325, 163 Misc. 723.

Presumption as to specific contents of document

Effort to conceal facts

Failure to call witness raises presumption that such witness' testimony would be adverse, where it appears that effort is being made to conceal facts.—Hennessy v. Daigle, 123 So. 900, 11 La.App. 474.

Inference as only inference allowed

Only inference, if any, that could have been drawn from defendant's failure to produce witness was that witness' testimony would have been unfavorable to defendant; defendant's failure to produce witness did not create inference that plaintiffs had not produced all evidence favorable to their claims.—Stocker v. Boston & M. R. R., 151 A. 457, 84 N.H. 377, 70 A.L.R. 1320.

(2) It must appear that witness was under control of litigant failing to produce him.—Llewellyn v. Cincinnati St. Ry. Co., 32 N.E.2d 33, 66 Ohio App. 107.

Meaning of "availability"

As regards inference to be drawn from failure of adverse party to produce witness, "available" does not mean merely available or accessible of subpœna, but "availability" depends either on party's superior means of knowledge of existence and identity of witness or relationship of witness to party, which would reasonably be expected to affect personal interest in outcome of litigation and make it natural that he would be expected to testify in favor of one party and against the other. Witness was peculiarly "available" to one party to action, when such party had so superior an opportunity for knowledge of witness, or there was such community of personal interest between party and witness as in ordinary experience would have made it reasonably probable that witness would have been called to testify for such party except for fact that it was known or feared that his testimony would be damaging rather than favorable.—In re Warden, Mo., 146 S.W.2d 874—Chavaries v. National Life & Accident Insurance Co., Mo.App., 110 S.W.2d 790—Huskey v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., Mo.App., 94 S.W.2d 1075.

Procurement by reasonable diligence

In admiralty the absence of an important witness whose testimony could have been procured by reasonable diligence warrants the inference that his testimony would not have been favorable to the party by whom he should have been called.—The Cananova, D.C.Pa., 297 F. 658.

Right to show availability

The opposite party may show that the witness is available to the party who fails to call him.

essential to a party's case, direct[7] or rebutting,[8] especially if the witness would naturally be favorable to the party's contention,[9] and the party relies instead on the evidence of witnesses less familiar with the matter.[10] Similarly, an adverse inference may arise against a party who fails to examine a witness as to facts covered by his special knowledge.[11]

However, it is not in every case that the failure to call a witness will justify an inference that his testimony would have been unfavorable to the party.[12] No such inference is created where the only

Witness under control of party

(1) Where there is a conflict of testimony, and a party fails to call an available friendly witness over whom he exercises control by employment, relationship, or otherwise, it may be inferred that witness' testimony would not have been favorable.—Marks v. Thompson, 1 N.Y.S. 2d 215.

(2) Where persons in the employ of, and under control of, plaintiff at time of accident were not called as witnesses by plaintiff, and the persons were near place of accident, there was a presumption that such persons' testimony would have been unfavorable to plaintiff, and the presumption was applicable even though plaintiff attempted to establish his case by circumstantial evidence.—Vandergriff v. Willett, Tenn.App., 137 S.W.2d 957.

Failure to call person related

The inference or presumption which operates against a party who fails to call a witness is stronger where the witness is related to such party.—First State Bank of Seminole v. Dillard, Tex.Civ.App., 71 S.W. 2d 407.

Willful attempt to suppress testimony

(1) Generally, where party to an action has failed to produce witnesses under his control, who could have testified to material facts favorable to such party, and has failed to explain his failure so to do, inference that testimony of witnesses, object of calling such witness would be to produce possibly unnecessary evidence;[13] or where an adverse inference would be improper for any other reason,[14] as, for example, where the witness not called is the attorney for the party,[15] or is mentally unsound,[16] or there is some legal prohibition against calling or eliciting the desired evidence from the witness.[17]

Corroborative or cumulative evidence. No inference arises against a party failing to call a witness where the only object of calling such witness would be to produce corroborative[18] or cumulative[19] evidence; although, according to some cases, the failure to call an available witness to corroborate the testimony of a party must be taken strongly against such party,[20] and it has been held that where a witness has been called and examined, an adverse inference may arise from the failure to elicit facts to corroborate the testimony of a party[21] or a mere witness.[22]

if produced, would have been unfavorable can be drawn only when under all the circumstances failure to produce witnesses, unexplained, creates a suspicion that failure was a willful attempt to withhold competent testimony.—Wright v. Safeway Stores, Wash., 109 P.2d 542.

(2) In a will contest, failure to call as witnesses those named as legatees is not necessarily suppression of evidence.—In re Moore's Estate, 182 P. 285, 180 Cal. 570.

(3) When evidence tends to prove material fact imposing liability on party and he refuses to produce evidence in his power, to produce which would overthrow case made if not founded on fact, presumption arises that such evidence would operate to his prejudice and support adversary's case, but failure to call witness so to testify does not amount to willful suppression of evidence.—Keena v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 239 P. 1061, 197 Cal. 148.

22 C.J. p 118 note 95.

Superiority of testimony

Generally, no inference can be drawn from the nonproduction of witnesses, unless their testimony would be superior in respect to the fact to be proved.

Testimony given on former hearing or prosecution

(1) No unfavorable inferences may be drawn from the failure of a party to call a witness where the only evidence that the absent witness might give material to the issues is already before the court in the shape of former evidence given by him in another case.—Lalakea v. Laupahoehoe Sugar Co., 33 Hawaii 745.

(2) Where contestants of will swore beneficiary as witness in probate court, failure of such witness to testify on appeal to circuit court did not raise presumption that his testimony would have been adverse to proponent.—In re Evans' Estate, 277 N.W. 893, 283 Mich. 275.

(3) Automobile accident victim was not precluded from recovering because he failed to call on driver of automobile in which he rode, to testify, it appearing that driver had testified on the prosecution of driver of automobile with which collision occurred.—Cherry-Burrell Co. v. Thatcher, C.C.A.Mont., 107 F.2d 65.

Exclusion of testimony of witness

(1) Rule that jury might draw unfavorable inferences from plaintiff's failure to call available witnesses applies only where available witnesses having peculiar or superior knowledge of facts and controversy have not been called, and does not apply where witnesses were actually called but their testimony was excluded because offered at improper time.—Costigan v. Third Ave. R. Co., 207 N.Y.S. 216, 124 Misc. 165.

Calling one of several witnesses

That plaintiff called only one of several witnesses who had equal opportunity to know fact sought to be established, did not authorize inference that other witness would have testified differently.—Bank of Emanuel v. Smith, 124 S.E. 114, 32 Ga.App. 606—22 C.J. p 118 note 94 [b].

Where witness has no other or better knowledge of the facts than that possessed by other witnesses called, the failure of plaintiff to call such witness did not give rise to an inference against him.—Baesens v. New York Cent. R. Co., 193 N.Y.S. 720, 201 App.Div. 191.

and the inference arising from such failure may be rebutted by evidence that the witness is unavailable, or that the party has made every reasonable effort to procure his attendance and testimony.[24] Further, the fact that the witness resides at a great distance from the place of trial and his attendance would involve considerable expense may tend to rebut any unfavorable inference which might otherwise arise from failure to call him.[25]

However, where no efforts have been made to procure the testimony of a witness, by issuing a subpœna or by taking his deposition, and it is not proposed to show that he is dead, or that the party who should have produced him could not reach him with process or take his deposition, the exclusion of a question by such party, where the witness was when last heard from, is proper.[26]

Witness available to both parties. It has been laid down in a large number of cases that where a witness is equally available or accessible to both parties, no presumption or inference against either party can arise by reason of his failure to call such witness.[27]

Propriety of matters in explanation

(1) In action for injuries in a collison, exclusion of written list of witnesses made by defendant's conductor at the time of the accident, with testimony of inability to produce certain of the witnesses, offered to create impression that testimony of such witnesses, if produced, would have been favorable to the defendant, was proper.—Niman v. Detroit United Ry., 183 N.W. 48, 214 Mich. 456.

(2) In an action against a street railway for injuries, the court did not err in refusing to allow witness to testify that he had inquired of every motorman and conductor operating in the vicinity of the accident, and that none of them had any knowledge of the occurrence claimed in order to avoid the inference that witnesses not produced would have given adverse evidence, where there was no question as to the identity of the car on which the accident occurred, and the court's and plaintiff's instructions predicated a recovery on the car shown in the evidence—Miller v. Fleming, Mo.App., 259 S.W. 139.

(3) Injured employee's testimony that other employees refused to appear and testify for fear of discharge was properly excluded.—Knight v. Texas & N. O. R. Co., Tex Civ.App., 26 S.W.2d 672.

(4) Testimony as to whether absent witnesses knew anything about accident is inadmissible.—El Paso Electric Co. v. Whitenack, Tex.Civ. App., 297 S.W. 258, affirmed, Com. App., 1 S.W.2d 594.

(2) In an action for damages for fraud in the sale of land, assuming that plaintiff had the right to prove that his wife was dead at the time of the trial, so that the jury might understand why she was not produced as a witness, he had no right to go into the particulars concerning her death and burial, and as a result thereof manifest such grief and distress as was calculated to arouse the sympathy of the jury.—Klein v. The rule that, where a party has control over certain witness, his failure to call witness entitles jury to accept testimony which witness might have controverted and refuse to accept testimony which he might have corroborated, should ordinarily be confined to witnesses within the jurisdiction of the court, whose attendance on the trial might be procured by subpœna.—Perlman v. as inadvertent,[28] and it would seem that it should apply in its full sense only where both parties are equally interested to procure the evidence of such witness, for a witness, while equally accessible to both parties, may be extremely favorable to one, and unfavorable, or even hostile, to the other, and under these circumstances it would seem a fair inference that the party to whom such witness was favorable omitted to call him because his testimony would not support the contentions of such party.[29] It is not difficult to find cases where an unfavorable inference has been indulged against a party who failed to call a witness who naturally would be favorable to him, regardless of the fact that the witness was in court and could have been called and examined by the other party.[30]

Adverse or hostile witness. No unfavorable inference can arise from a party's failure to call or examine a witness who, although possessing peculiar knowledge of the facts, is adverse to him,[31] as for instance, the spouse of the adverse party,[32] or the co-respondent in a divorce suit.[33]

Party calling no witnesses. Where a party calls no witnesses, but submits his case in reliance on the insufficiency of his adversary's evidence, no unfavorable inferences arise from his failure to call witnesses having special knowledge.[34]

Taking over witness. No adverse presumption arises from a party's failure to call a material witness who is present, where on such witness being called by the adverse party, the party who originally failed to call him proceeds to make the witness his own.[35]

However, there is authority that where an adverse witness has been called by a party who fails to interrogate him as to a vital issue, there is an inference that the answer of the witness would have been unfavorable to such party.—Marks v. Thompson, 1 N.Y.S.2d 215.

Failure to call witness adverse to both parties

Where witness was hostile or adverse to both plaintiffs and defendants, failure of either plaintiffs or defendants to call witness would not permit drawing of unfavorable inference against them.—Marks v. Thompson, supra.

Pending litigation between party and witness

In will contest, proponent's failure to call as witness neighbor claimed to have exercised undue influence on testator did not create presumption that testimony would have been unfavorable to proponent, where there was then litigation pending between proponent and neighbor.—In re Simpson's Estate, 14 P.2d 1, 169 Wash. 419.

possessing peculiar knowledge has been denominated a "strong presumption of law,"[36] it has also been stated that such failure raises no presumption at all, but merely authorizes the jury to draw unfavorable inferences.[37] Any inference drawn from such failure is not equivalent to direct evidence;[38] it does not take the place of evidence of material facts,[39] or shift the burden of proof so as to relieve the party on whom rests the necessity of establishing a prima facie case;[40] the inference is not conclusive.[41]

The extent of a party's right to invoke his opponent's failure to call an available witness is merely to impair the value of the opponent's proofs and to give greater credence to the positive evidence of the party on any issue on which it is shown that the witness might have had knowledge.[42] The probative force of the inference varies with the strength of the inducement to call the witness were his evidence favorable,[43] and is intensified where a party declines to avail himself of such evidence to meet a prima facie case of fraud or illegality.[44]

d. Failure of Party to Testify

As a general rule, in the absence of explanation, the nonappearance of a party at the trial or his failure to testify as to material facts within his knowledge creates an inference that he refrained from appearing or testifying because the truth, if made to appear, would not aid his contention.

While there is some authority to the effect that the failure of a party to testify creates no unfavorable inference,[45] as a general rule the nonappearance of a litigant at the trial[46] or his failure or

In Illinois

(1) The view has been taken that no unfavorable intendment should be made against a party because he does not testify for himself.—Lowe v. Massey, 62 Ill. 47—Princeville v. Hitchcock, 101 Ill.App. 589.

(2) No presumption of lack of due care arises from plaintiff's failure to testify as to his conduct prior to an accident.—Budek v. City of Chicago, 279 Ill.App. 410.

(3) However, some cases seem to indicate approval of the general rule that, when a party refuses to testify as to relevant matters, the presumption is that the testimony, if given, would be unfavorable to him.—Central Stock & Grain Exchange v. Chicago Bd. of Trade, 63 N.E. 740, 196 Ill. 396—Stamas v. Waskow, 250 Ill.App. 364—Barron v. Levinson, 191 Ill.App. 35.

Attorney's nonappearance at disciplinary proceeding

Where attorney, accused of soliciting personal injury cases, purposely absented himself at hearing before referee so as to prevent prosecutor of the charges from calling him for cross-examination under the statute, the supreme court would assume that those who secured personal injury cases for him were authorized by him to do what was done to secure them.—In re McDonald, 282 N.W.

ference that he refrained from appearing or testifying because the truth, if made to appear, would not aid his contention.

However, the general rule is not applicable in all circumstances.[50] It does not apply where the testimony of the party is unnecessary,[51] or where his failure to testify is fully and satisfactorily explained.[52] Further, no unfavorable inference may be drawn where it is shown that the party has no personal knowledge of the facts in issue,[53] or where the facts within his knowledge have been otherwise fully established,[54] as, for example, by deposition,[55] interrogatories,[56] or by testimony at a former proceeding.[57]

No unfavorable inference results from the failure of the party to testify where he is unavoidably absent from the trial,[58] where his mind is impaired,[59] or where he is incompetent as a witness;[60] but a claim that a party was too nervous to attend the trial and testify has been held to be insufficient to prevent unfavorable inferences arising from his failure.[61]

Necessity for prima facie case. Where the party on whom the burden of proof rests has failed to make out a prima facie case, the absence of the adverse party, or his failure to testify, raises no unfavorable inference against him.[62]

Duty to speak

Party charged need not speak until

as a witness have practically the same effect as a refusal to testify, and warrant an inference that direct and truthful answers would have been unfavorable to his contentions.[63]

Strength of inference. The inference arising from the failure of a party to testify does not take the place of evidence of material facts,[64] or shift the burden of proof as to relieve the party on whom rests the duty of establishing a prima facie case.[65] Moreover, there is no rule which binds the jury to look to the inference to the exclusion of, or as negativing, positive testimony.[66]

However, the failure of a party to appear or to testify is a circumstance to be considered by the court or jury in the determination of questions of fact on which the testimony of the party would have shed light,[67] and in connection with an unequivocal statement on the other side, which, if untrue, could be disproved by his testimony, often furnishes strong evidence of the fact asserted.[68]

e. Exclusion of Privileged Communication

A party's failure to produce, or his refusal to consent to the admission of, testimony of a witness as to privileged communications generally gives rise to no unfavorable inference.

other party has introduced evidence making case against him.

Relying on adversary's evidence
If all doubt as to the truthfulness of one party's contention is removed by positive evidence proceeding from the witnesses introduced against him, no presumption detrimental to him can be indulged from his failure to testify, as without subjecting himself to the imputation of withholding evidence he may properly rely on that which his adversary introduces, where it is uncontradicted.—Citizens' Bank of Union v. When evidence is closely balanced, the inference arising from a party's failure to testify may turn the scales—Doty v. Wheeler, 182 A. 468, 120 Conn. 672—Middletown Trust Co. v. Bregman, 174 A. 67, 118 Conn. 651.

Allegation of fraud
(1) Where a party is accused of fraud and makes no denial of the accusation there is a particularly strong inference against him.—Mathews v. O'Donnell, 233 S.W. 451, 289 Mo. 235—22 C.J. p 122 note 32 [a].

(2) Such inference may even authorize rendition of a judgment against him.—Van Ingen v. Peterson, 31 Ohio Cir.Ct. 506.

The more generally accepted view is that no unfavorable inference arises from a party's failure to produce, or refusal to consent to the admission of, testimony of a witness as to privileged communications between himself and such party;[69] but there is also authority for the view that under such circumstances an unfavorable inference will arise[70] or may be drawn by the jury.[71]

§ 157. Presumptions Arising from Attempts to Prevent Investigation

An attempt to prevent an investigation of the matter in controversy may raise a presumption adverse to a party.

Where a party attempts to prevent an investigation of the matter in controversy, such attempt may be shown, and will raise a presumption adverse to him.[72]

V. RELEVANCY AND MATERIALITY GENERALLY

A. GENERAL RULES

§ 158. Logical Relevancy

"Logical relevancy" in evidence may be defined as the existence of such a relationship in logic between the fact of which evidence is offered and a fact in issue that the existence of the former renders probable or improbable the existence of the latter.

Logic is the controlling factor in the modern law of evidence. An offer of a party to prove a fact in evidence involves an assertion by him that such a relation exists in reason as a matter of logic between the fact offered and a fact in issue that the existence of the former renders probable or improbable the existence of the latter, and the relation thus asserted is termed "relevancy."[73] It is, therefore, a basic rule of evidence that evidence of whatever facts are logically relevant to the issue is legally admissible[74] except as it may be excluded by

Physician and patient

(1) Where communications between a physician and patient are privileged, the failure of the patient to call the physician as a witness does not give rise to an inference that if the physician were called his testimony would be adverse.
U.S.—Halsband v. Columbian Nat. Life Ins. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 67 F.2d 863, certiorari denied Columbian Nat. Life Ins. Co. v. Halsband, 54 S.Ct. 531, 291 U.S. 681, 78 L.Ed. 1068.

fore, that the rules of evidence are largely those of exclusion.[78]

The rules of evidence are designed to secure an orderly administration of the law[79] and must be given a reasonable and liberal construction to meet and serve the purposes and requirements of changing conditions,[80] avoiding highly refined and metaphysical distinctions;[81] but in a judicial hearing fair rules of evidence are essential.[82] The admissibility of evidence must depend on sound legal principles and not on the discretion of the trial court,[83] although, on the other hand, it cannot depend entirely on fixed and definite rules.[84]

No precise and universal test of relevancy is furnished by the law[85] but the determination of whether particular evidence is relevant rests largely in the discretion of the court,[86] which must be exercised according to the teachings of reason and judicial experience.[87]

Materiality of fact or issue. The admissibility of evidence depends on the question at issue.[88] Relevancy depends not only on logical relationship between the evidence offered and the particular fact but also on such a relationship to a fact which is material,[89] and evidence is not made relevant by being directed to proof of an immaterial issue.[90] No test of relevancy is furnished by a consideration of whether or not an issue raised by the pleadings will be submitted to the jury.[91]

Time of determination. The admissibility of evidence must be determined as of the time at which it is offered.[92]

Civil and criminal proceedings. The rules governing the admissibility of evidence and the tests of its relevancy are in general, as stated in Criminal Law § 600, the same in civil actions and criminal prosecutions.

§ 159. Legal Relevancy or Materiality

Relevant or material evidence is evidence which is not only logically relevant but is of sufficient probative value in the particular case to justify its admission.

Notwithstanding evidence may be logically relevant as the term has been discussed in the preceding section, its admission must be subject to the primary test of its value in the particular case,[93] and in the case of a trial by jury to its fitness to be considered by the jury.[94] The practical conditions under which cases are tried do not always permit the court to hear all the facts which may be in any degree logically relevant to the issue, but require that facts received shall have a somewhat higher degree of probative force, which may be termed "legal relevancy" or "materiality,"[95] and evidence

Test of remoteness

(1) Generally, the question of remoteness must depend on all considerations, including time, the character of the evidence, and all the surrounding circumstances which, in the opinion of the court, ought to have a bearing on its worthiness to be brought into the consideration and determination of the matter in contention.—Bishop v. Copp, 114 A. 682, 96 Conn. 571.

Matters not within witness' knowledge

Generally speaking a witness may not testify in regard to matters not within his personal knowledge.—Carroll v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 15 A.2d 819, 125 N.J.Law 397.

Evidence held not inadmissible as being conjectural or a mere guess.—Traders' & General Ins. Co. v. Hurst, Tex.Civ.App., 55 S.W.2d 1057, error merely because it is somewhat remote[2] or uncertain[3] or because it is improbable[4] or may conflict with other evidence which the party introduces.[5]

"Materiality," with reference to evidence, means the property of substantial importance[6] and it has been said that evidence is material where it is relevant and goes to the substantial matters in dispute or has a legitimate or effective bearing on the decision of the case.[7] Whether facts are material to any inquiry must be determined by the nature of the right or liability asserted[8] or the issue formed.[9] Proof of any facts essential to plaintiff's recovery is material to the issue.[10]

Discretion. The exclusion of evidence as not material[11] or, more specifically, as not of probative value commensurate with the time which would be required for its use as evidence,[12] either because too remote,[13] too uncertain,[14] or too conjectural,[15] is a matter largely within the discretion of the court. Such discretion must be exercised without prejudice to the litigant[16] and cannot be exercised to reject material evidence.[17]

Confusing, misleading, or prejudicial evidence. Evidence, although logically relevant, may and should be excluded where it will have an undue tendency to confuse or mislead the jury,[18] particularly where the issues are close,[19] as where it would draw into the case issues foreign to the litigation[20] or would serve comparatively little or no purpose except to arouse the passion, prejudice, or sympathy of the jury;[21] but evidence which is properly admissible under the issues presented cannot be excluded merely because of collateral effects detrimental to the party objecting,[22] or because arousing sympathy or prejudice,[23] or because it brings out with it other matters which are not in issue.[24] A distinction is made in some jurisdictions between direct and circumstantial evidence, it being proper to exclude merely circumstantial evidence which would create unfair prejudice[25] but not to exclude direct evidence[26] or evidence of facts directly involved as elements in the case.[27] Whether evidence should be excluded as confusing or misleading[28] or as within the undue prejudice rule[29] is largely in the discretion of the trial court.

§ 160. Intrinsic Sufficiency Not Required

It is not essential that evidence to be admissible be sufficient in itself to establish the whole or any definite portion of a party's contention.

A relevant fact will not be rejected because not sufficient in itself to establish the whole or any definite portion of a party's contention,[30] but all that is required is that the fact must legally tend to prove some matter in issue[31] or to make a propto the admissibility of a party's testimony that it is competent only on his own theory of the case; he has a right to have the case submitted to the jury on his theory if there is any testimony to support it.[34]

Weight and sufficiency. Evidence is not rendered inadmissible by reason of objections going merely to its weight,[35] unless it lacks sufficient probative force to be legally relevant or material within the rule discussed in the preceding section.

§ 161. Circumstantial Evidence Generally

Circumstantial evidence is evidence which does not directly prove the existence of a fact but merely gives rise to a logical inference that it exists; such evidence is admissible if it affords a basis for a reasonable inference of the existence of the fact.

Circumstantial evidence is evidence which, without going directly to prove the existence of a fact, gives rise to a logical inference that such fact does exist.[36]

In the absence of a statute to the contrary,[37] in civil cases, as well as in criminal proceedings, circumstantial evidence is admissible,[38] at least in the absence of direct evidence.[39]

The trial court usually has considerable discre-

Other definitions

(1) "Circumstantial evidence" consists in proof of facts and circumstances which are collateral to the fact that is sought to be established and from which the mind concludes that the main or ultimate fact existed.—Duke v. Houston Oil Co. of Texas, Tex.Civ.App., 128 S.W.2d 480, error dismissed, judgment correct.

(2) The evidence of facts and circumstances which, when established, lead the mind to certain conclusions or inferences taken therefrom; the inference of a fact from other facts proved, and the fact thus inferred and assented to by the mind is said to be presumed or taken for granted until the contrary is proved; where, some facts being proved, another fact follows as a natural or very probable conclusion from the facts actually proved, so as readily to gain the assent of the mind from the mere probability of its having occurred.—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Warden, Tex.Civ.App., 78 S.W.2d 164, 166, quoting Corpus Juris—11 C.J. p 769 notes 42–44.

Experience of mankind as basis

"Circumstantial evidence" is evidence that tends to prove a fact in issue by proving other events or circumstances which, according to the common experience of mankind, are usually or always attended by the fact in issue, and, therefore, affords a basis for reasonable inference by jury or court of occurrence of fact in issue.

As direct evidence

While direct and circumstantial evidence have been distinguished, see supra § 2, nevertheless it has been stated that circumstantial evidence is merely direct evidence indirectly employed.—Perry's Adm'x v. Inter-Southern Life Ins. Co., 58 S.W.2d 906, 248 Ky. 491.

Surrounding circumstances distinguished

Reasonable conduct is a conclusion to be drawn by the trier of facts from other facts, and hence all the surrounding circumstances become material facts, as distinguished from circumstantial evidence from which a conclusion as to the existence of such facts is sought to be drawn.—Bunten v. Ind.—Czuczko v. Golden-Gary Co., 177 N.E. 466, 94 Ind.App. 47, re-

tion as to the latitude of circumstantial evidence,[40] and great latitude generally is allowed in admitting it,[41] especially where direct evidence is lacking.[42]

The facts offered as circumstantial evidence must afford a basis for a reasonable inference of the existence or nonexistence of the fact sought to be proved.[43] Usually such facts are admissible when they throw light on or will assist in a determination of the matter in issue,[44] although in some cases it has been held or stated that the facts introduced as circumstantial evidence must make highly probable,[45] or point strongly in the direction of,[46] the existence or nonexistence of the fact in issue. Where a particular circumstance may control the decision, it has been held that great care should be exercised in admitting it.[47] Facts are admissible as circumstantial evidence, although they may afford an inference other than that for which they are offered,[48] if the inference sought to be drawn is more,[49] or at least not less,[50] probable than any other inference which might be drawn, although it has been held that facts are admissible only where they are consistent with the theory sought to be established and inconsistent with any other.[51] At any rate, a circumstance must be sufficient in connection with other circumstances to give rise to more than a mere suspicion of the existence of the fact sought to be proved,[52] and the facts from which an inference is to be drawn must themselves be proved.[53]

The admissibility of circumstantial evidence is not dependent on its sufficiency, standing alone, to take the case to the jury.[54]

§ 162. Supplementary and Consistent Facts

Evidence of collateral facts may, in the discretion of the court, be admitted where it may aid the trier of fact in determining the truth of the matter in issue.

As a rule, sometimes declared by statute, the admission or exclusion of evidence of collateral facts rests largely in the discretion of the court.[55] Such evidence may be admissible where it may aid the trier of fact in determining the truth of the matter in issue.[56]

While a fact does not become relevant merely because its existence is consistent with a party's contention,[57] a collateral fact is relevant and admissible when it tends to render probable the contention of the party producing it;[58] and the court may receive aid from evidence which in itself is not relevant to any issue in the case, but which is corroborative of other evidence on a disputed point.[59] Thus evidence may be admitted to show a party's good faith[60] or motive,[61] or to show that an opponent's contention is probably unsound because maintained in bad faith.[62] The court may, especially where the testimony is conflicting, receive evidence of all of the circumstances attending a transaction and the relations of the parties[63] to aid the trier of fact properly to understand their conduct[64] or motives,[65] or to judge as to the reasonableness[66] or unreasonableness[67] of their respective claims. Evidence of facts which happened before or after the transaction in issue, but which relate directly to it, may be admissible,[68] as where they were, or probably may have been, the cause or the effect of a fact in issue.[69]

On the other hand, evidence of collateral facts is to be received with caution,[70] and the court may, in a proper case, reject it,[71] and should reject it when it overshadows the real issues in the case.[72] Evidence of collateral facts is excluded where such facts have no connection with the subject litigated and, therefore, are incapable of shedding light on the inquiry or affording grounds for reasonable presumptions or inferences.[73]

§ 163. Matters Showing Relevancy of Other Facts or Explanatory of Facts in Evidence or Inferences Therefrom

Facts may be admissible which establish the relevancy of evidence, or explain or render more certain and definite evidence already given, or substantiate inferences therefrom, or which diminish the force of unfavorable facts shown by the opponent.

Facts whose existence is a necessary preliminary to the relevancy of evidence,[74] such as the accuracy of a photograph[75] or a set of books,[76] or the identity of a cause of action,[77] are properly received. In addition, facts which are otherwise irrelevant may be admissible because, by explaining or unfolding a situation, they establish the relevancy of evidence,[78] or because they explain or render more certain and definite evidence which has already been given,[79] or substantiate an inference which might be drawn therefrom.[80]

Explanatory evidence is equally competent to diminish the force of unfavorable facts shown by the opposing party,[81] as by suggesting reasons why witnesses have not been called[82] or books produced.[83]

§ 164. Evidence Irrelevant Unless Preceded or Followed by Other Evidence

Evidence may be admissible where, although it is irrelevant standing alone, it is or may be expected to become relevant in connection with other evidence, or where it forms a link in the chain of evidence necessary to support a party's contention.

Evidence may be admissible where, although it is irrelevant standing alone, it is or may be expected to become relevant in connection with other evidence,[84] or where it forms a link in the chain of evidence necessary to support a party's contention.[85] Conversely, evidence which is not independ-

Compliance with statute

Where a statute provides for the doing of a certain act as evidence of compliance with the statute, evidence of the doing of such act may be admissible as evidence of such compliance, without the aid of other evidence.—Coates v. Marion County, 189 P. 903, 96 Or. 334.

ently relevant is inadmissible unless its relevancy is made to appear by other evidence,[86] the onus of making such a showing being on the party offering the evidence.[87] Where an apparently irrelevant fact is offered, there must be shown a probability that its relevancy will subsequently appear; the mere possibility that it will do so is not enough.[88]

§ 165. Negative Evidence

Testimony as to the nonexistence of a fact, or as to witness' want of knowledge of its existence, may be admissible where the situation of the witness was such that if the fact had existed he probably would have known it.

Although negative evidence may be so entirely destitute of probative value as to be inadmissible,[89] it is by no means necessary that relevant evidence should always be presented in an affirmative form.[90] Testimony as to the nonexistence of a fact or as to witness' want of knowledge of its existence is admissible where the situation of the witness was such that if the fact had existed he probably would have known it.[91] Thus, it is well settled that evidence that a witness did not see,[92] hear,[93] or observe[94] is relevant, provided the circumstances are such as properly to lead to the inference that the alleged fact would have been seen, heard, or observed had it actually existed.[95] Absence of knowledge of a particular fact may also be a relevant mental state.[96] The circumstance that there is no entry,[97] record,[98] or memorandum[99] of a fact where it would naturally be found if it existed may be relevant. However, such relevancy is, except in cases where the law requires that an instrument to be effective shall be recorded, entirely dependent on the inference arising from regularity and disinterestedness that if the fact existed an entry of it would have been made in that particular place.[1]

§ 166. Unnecessary Evidence

Evidence otherwise admissible may be excluded where the time necessary to hear it would not be judiciously expended because it is merely cumulative, or tends only to prove facts which are admitted, not controverted, sufficiently proved, or otherwise before the jury, or which are obviously true.

The fact that evidence may be relevant and material does not necessarily require its admission, but it may, in the discretion of the court, be excluded if the time necessary to hear it would not be judiciously expended because it is merely cumulative,[2] or tends only to prove facts which are admitted,[3] not controverted,[4] sufficiently proved,[5] or otherwise before the jury,[6] or which are obviously true.[7] Such evidence will be the more readily excluded where if admitted it probably would prejudice and mislead the jury.[8]

B. PARTICULAR MATTERS

§ 167. Ancient Facts

The proof of facts which occurred at a time fairly beyond the ordinary period of personal memory by hearsay evidence is considered infra §§ 195–200, and the admissibility and effect of ancient documents infra §§ 743–752.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 168. Facts of Family History

Where a contention is based on a transaction which, if it occurred, would probably be recorded in family records, existence of the appropriate entry in a proper place is a fact circumstantially relevant.

Where a contention is necessarily based on a transaction which, if it actually occurred, would probably be recorded in family records, existence of the appropriate entry in a proper place is a fact circumstantially relevant.[9]

§ 169. Age

Age may be proved by relevant circumstantial evidence.

Age may be proved by circumstantial evidence[10] which is shown to be relevant.[11]

§ 170. Birth

Matters relating to the birth of a person may be established by circumstantial evidence.

Matters relating to the fact, date, and place of a person's birth may be established by circumstantial evidence.[12]

Evidence of the presence of a person at a certain place very early in life has been held admissible to prove that such place is his birthplace,[13] although there is authority to the contrary.[14]

§ 171. Name of Person or Place

The fact that a certain name has been used to designate an individual may be established by the evidence of any person who knows it.

The fact that a certain name has been used to designate a particular individual may be established by the evidence of any person who knows it.[15]

§ 172. Relationship

The rules governing the admissibility of hearsay evidence to prove matters of pedigree or relationship are treated infra §§ 226–232.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 173. Identity

Identity may be established by relevant circumstantial evidence, and any evidence which tends to satisfy a person of ordinary judgment is admissible on the issue.

Evidence to prove identity must be relevant.[16] However, in the absence of direct evidence or inspection by the jury, identity may be established by circumstantial evidence.[17]

Any fact, however slight, which tends to satisfy a person of ordinary judgment as to identity is admissible on the issue.[18] The identity of a person may be proved by a description of his physical appearance and characteristics,[19] or by proof of indicative manifestations, such as declarations showing peculiar knowledge,[20] or by proof of conduct, such as residence in a particular locality,[21] or service in the army at a certain time.[22]

§ 174. Mental Condition

Evidence of the mental condition of a person is admissible where such condition is an issue in the case.

Evidence of the mental condition of a person may be introduced where the existence of such a condition is an issue in the case.[23]

For the purpose of proving the mental condition of a person, evidence as to his conduct,[24] or as to other circumstances throwing light on the condition of his mind,[25] may be admitted. Ordinarily, however, a mental condition is not shown by a single manifestation and evidence of a single instance is inadmissible;[26] but the court may, in the proper exercise of its discretion, admit such evidence, or admit evidence of its manifestation in a number of instances, after other evidence of the condition has first been introduced.[27]

§ 175. Mental State and Moral Qualities

Where the mental state of a person is relevant to the issues in the case, it may be proved by evidence of his conduct, or by other circumstantial evidence.

Evidence as to the state of mind of a person is inadmissible where his mental state is not an issue in the case;[28] but such evidence is admissible where relevant to the issues.[29]

There is inherent difficulty in establishing the existence of a mental state or in tracing the operations of the human mind;[30] and therefore the mental state of a person who has not testified with respect thereto may be proved by evidence of his conduct[31] or by other circumstantial evidence.[32]

Moral qualities. Proof of moral qualities presents the same practical difficulties as proof of mental state, with which they are much involved and frequently blend.[33]

§ 176. Nature and Condition of Property or Other Subject Matter

The nature and condition of property may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

The existence of a particular trait, characteristic, or condition in inanimate objects or animals may be proved by instances of its manifestation[34] or by other circumstantial evidence.[35]

§ 177. Pecuniary Condition

Evidence tending to prove the pecuniary condition of parties to the action, or of other persons, is admissible when relevant to the issues in the case.

Evidence as to the pecuniary condition of the parties to the action,[36] or of other persons,[37] is inadmissible when irrelevant to the issues in the case; but, where the pecuniary condition of the parties or of other persons is in issue, evidence tending to prove it is admissible.[38]

Evidence of the general reputation of a person for financial responsibility is relevant on the question of his solvency,[39] and an exemplification of the tax digest by the clerk of the court of ordinary of the county in which a person was a resident has been held admissible on the issue of his financial condition.[40] Within reasonable limits, proof of insolvency at a particular time is relevant as circumstantial evidence on the question of insolvency at an earlier date,[41] but evidence that a person was insolvent at a particular time has been held not relevant as circumstantial evidence that he was insolvent six months or more prior thereto, especially where shortly before the earlier date he transferred his property to secure payment of his obligations.[42]

§ 178. Motive, Intent, and Knowledge

Evidence of motive, intent, and knowledge is admissible where such matters are pertinent to the issues in the case.

42. Wis.—Ellis v. State, 119 N.W. 1110, 138 Wis. 513, 20 L.R.A.,N.S., 444.

Evidence of the motive, intent, or knowledge with which a person acted, or failed to act, is inadmissible where the legal significance of his conduct is not affected by such matters,[43] but evidence of motive, intent, or knowledge is admissible where such matters are pertinent to the issues in the case.[44] Thus, where it is disputed whether a person has done a certain act, evidence is admissible to show that he intended to do it,[45] or to show the existence of a motive on his part to do it, or to refrain from doing it.[46]

When the motive, intent, or knowledge of a person is pertinent to the issues in the case, the evidence to prove such matters must be relevant.[47] Such matters are seldom capable of direct proof,[48] and they may be proved by evidence as to the character[49] or conduct[50] of the person, or by other circumstantial evidence.[51]

§ 179. Conduct of Parties with Respect to Evidence

Evidence that a party attempted to prevent a fair trial, as by the suppression or fabrication of evidence, is admissible to show that he is conscious of the weakness of his case.

is conscious of the weakness of his case, or is guilty of the act charged or that his claim or defense is false, a party may prove that his adversary attempted to flee after the accident,[52] and, in addition, he may show that his adversary attempted to avoid a complete and fair trial[53] as, for example, by the fabrication[54] or suppression[55] of evidence, or by the intimidation or corruption of witnesses,[56] or by his failure or refusal to call available witnesses,[57] or by other methods.[58]

However, evidence that a third person attempted to prevent a fair trial is inadmissible to prove that a party is conscious of the weakness of his case, in the absence of a showing that the party knew of, or was connected with, the attempt.[59]

§ 180. Customs and Course of Business

The custom of a party or his employees, or the course of conducting his business, may become relevant and material in an action involving some claim or liability arising out of such business.

It frequently happens that the custom of a party or his employees, or the course of conducting his business, may become relevant and material in an action involving some claim or liability arising out of such business;[60] and evidence of a habit of doing a thing in the course of business is, if clearly shown as a definite course of action, admissible as indicating that, on a particular occasion, the thing was done as usual.[61]

However, such evidence is inadmissible when irrelevant to the issues in the case.[62] Evidence which is irrelevant or insufficient to prove a course of business is inadmissible for the purpose.[63] The mere existence of a custom is not necessarily relevant, where no connection thereof with the transaction in question is shown;[64] and, in a given case, the evidence of habit may be so remote, or have such tendency to produce confusion in its collateral bearing on the issue to which it relates, as to call for its exclusion, in the discretion of the court.[65]

§ 181. Value

Evidence as to the value of property is admissible only where the value of property is in issue. A wide range of investigation is permitted in determining value and the rules as to the admission of evidence are liberally construed.

Evidence as to the value of property is admissible only where the value of property is an issue in the case.[66] Where there is a contract, but a dispute as to the contract price has arisen, evidence of the value of the subject matter is admissible as relevant to the matter in dispute.[67]

Value, whether intrinsic or as regulated by the "market," is a quality so subtle and intangible, is a function of so many variables and these, frequently, of such a trivial nature, where intrinsic, it is so largely a matter of individual estimate or opinion, and when judged by the market its standards so largely consist of the opinion not under oath of a large and usually indefinite number of persons as indicated by trade lists, prices current, and other publications more or less official, that a relaxation of strict rules of evidence is necessary, and use must be made of such probative methods as are available.[68] Value or market price may be shown by either direct or circumstantial evidence.[69]

Generally, the law assumes that the value of a thing is what it will fetch in the open market,[70] the price which the owner, if willing, but not compelled, to sell could obtain from a buyer, willing, but not compelled, to buy.[71]

The admissibility of opinion evidence as to value is discussed infra §§ 501, 545. The admissibility of evidence of similar transactions or acts to prove value is discussed infra § 593.

Market value has been defined as a price established by public sales in the way of ordinary business.[72] Where market value is shown to exist, it may be proved as it existed at any time at which it is relevant.[73] Where a witness has testified as to the market value of an article, further testimony as to whether the value given represents value in trade is properly excluded.[74] Where there is no regular market for a commodity, a wide range of investigation is permitted in determining its market value, and the rules relating to the admission of evidence are liberally construed.[75] Hearsay of a

Cost plus contract

Where plaintiff, who was to charge for lumber for millwork, at cost plus ten per cent, had bought lumber at "log run," and selected therefrom the best for such work, and charged therefor what it was deemed to be worth when graded, evidence of market value of such grade is admissible to test reasonableness of such charge.—Rutland Sash & Door Co. v. concurrent or composite type is often admitted,[76] but it is otherwise as to the statement of a particular person, not a witness, on the subject of market value.[77]

Explaining market value. It is always open to a party, for the purpose of impairing the weight of evidence introduced by the opposite party, to assign and substantiate reasons why the market price proved by his antagonist is unduly enhanced or unduly depressed.[78]

Exchange. Where the parties to an exchange of property place values on the parcels or items involved solely for the purpose of facilitating the exchange, the value so placed on any particular item or parcel has been held to be,[79] and not to be,[80] admissible as evidence of its value.

Growing crops. Where the value of growing crops is in issue, evidence of the annual rental for the land and the cost of planting and bringing forward the crop to the time in issue is admissible.[81] Testimony as to the probable size and value of the matured crop is admissible.[82] Where the issue is limited to the value of the growing crop on part of the land, evidence of the value of the crop raised on the remainder of the land is admissible.[83]

a. In General

Where the value of realty is in issue, any competent evidence of matters which would be considered by a reasonable vendor or purchaser is admissible; the character, location, and possible uses of the land may be considered in determining its value.

Where the value of real estate is in issue, the evidence should be directed toward establishing the fair cash market value of the property.[84] Any competent evidence of matters, not merely speculative,[85] which would be considered by a prospective vendor or purchaser, or which tend to enhance or depreciate the value of the property, is admissible.[86] The character,[87] location,[88] and physical condition[89] of the real estate, and the use to which it is put,[90] may be placed before the jury, and evidence is admissible to show any probable use to which the land could reasonably be put,[91] such as manufacturing,[92] farming,[93] railroad,[94] or residential[95] purposes, although it is not then being used for such purposes.[96] However, speculative or remote ways in which the land could be used cannot be considered in determining its value.[97]

Special or peculiar value or lack of value which the land has for a witness,[98] or for the owner,[99] or for a prospective purchaser,[1] is irrelevant.

Intrinsic value. It is said that evidence as to the intrinsic value of land is admissible where the land is shown not to have a market value,[2] but not otherwise.[3]

Improvements. The character of the improvements on the land[4] and the extent of improvement going on around it[5] are relevant circumstances on an issue of value. It has been held permissible to show the cost of constructing the improvements;[6]

Improvement already included in valuation

Where the evidence fixed the value of real property as enhanced by improvements, the court properly excluded evidence of the cost of such improvements in a contest of a sale of certain heir's interest to others at appraised value.—Ziebarth v. Donaldson, 185 N.W. 377, 150 Minn. 308.

Party wall

Under Code 1897 § 3000, providing that an adjoining owner, desiring to use a party wall, shall pay to the owner thereof "one half of its value, or one half of the part which he wishes to hold in common," in an action to recover one half of the value of a party wall, evidence of what it would have cost to build the wall at the time that defendant's use of it began was properly admitted to show the value of the wall at that time.—

but where the issue was as to the value of a structure, it was held not permissible to show the cost or value of the labor employed in its construction.[7] Evidence that the structure is not the best use of the land and would not be erected anew is admissible.[8]

Encumbrances. A mortgage on land is not evidence of the value of the land since it is usually given as security for a debt and may have no relationship whatever to the value of the property mortgaged.[9] The amount of a mortgage or trust deed on property is not proof of the value of the real estate at the time of its foreclosure.[10] The assumption of a mortgage is not evidence of the value of the land as against any one other than the party assuming the mortgage.[11]

Valuation by owner. The owner of real estate may testify as to the amount he would be willing to accept and would expect to receive on a sale.[12]

Insurance. The amount of insurance placed on a building furnishes no direct evidence of its value,[13] but where it might indicate an estimate of the value of the property by the witness inconsistent with that testified to by him, the amount of insurance may be shown for impeachment purposes.[14]

b. Sales

The price realized on a sale of the land made under ordinary circumstances is evidence of the value of the property at the time of the sale, and of its value at a time reasonably near the sale, provided conditions have remained the same.

A sale of real property made under ordinary circumstances is evidence of its value at the time of the sale,[15] and may be shown to prove value at a different time provided the time interval is short and conditions remain substantially the same;[16]

Few free and open sales

It is common knowledge that there have been few free and open sales of realty in the rural areas in the last few years, and, consequently, there is no sales basis for determining a market value at a given time. —City and County of Denver v. Lyttle, 103 P.2d 1, 106 Colo. 157.

but where the sale was made at a time remote from the time as of which the property is to be valued or where conditions have materially changed between the time of the sale and the time in issue, evidence of the sale price is not admissible to prove the value of the property at the time in issue.[17]

In determining the probative force of a sale to establish value, all of the circumstances surrounding the sale may be considered.[18]

Forced sales. It is broadly stated that the price realized on a forced sale of realty, such as a tax, foreclosure, or execution sale, is not admissible as evidence of value,[19] and this rule has been applied to sales made pending proceedings to condemn the property for public use;[20] but it has been held that evidence as to the price realized at a forced sale is admissible,[21] at least where the purchaser at the forced sale was a third person who had no part in bringing about the forced sale.[22]

Auction sales. The price obtained at a voluntary auction sale of land,[23] or of an undivided interest therein,[24] is admissible as some evidence of the value of the land, in the absence of proof of imposition or mistake,[25] and is good evidence that the land is worth as much as was paid for it.[26] Such evidence should, however, be accompanied by evidence of the relative condition of the property at the time of sale and at the time in dispute.[27] Where the land is bid in by the owner, the price is not admissible on the issue of value.[28]

Price paid. It has been held that, taken alone, the price paid for land furnishes no evidence of value,[29] even when the bona fides of the transaction is shown.[30] Generally, however, evidence as to the price paid for the land is treated the same as evidence of any sale of the land, and such evidence is admissible if the purchase satisfies the rules as to relevancy generally governing the admissibility of evidence as to sales.[31] Thus, for evidence of the purchase to be admissible to prove the value of the land, the price must have been paid as part of a voluntary and bona fide transaction,[32] and the purchase must have taken place at a time not too remote from the time as of which the property is to be valued, and conditions in the interim must have remained substantially the same.[33]

Price received. It is generally held that evidence of the price received by the owner at a subsequent sale of the land is admissible to prove the value of the land as of the time in dispute, if the sale satisfies the rules as to probative force generally governing the admissibility in evidence of sales to prove value;[34] but it has also been held that the price received for land is not admissible to prove its value.[35]

Contract. The price fixed in a contract of sale has been held admissible to prove the value of the land.[36]

c. Offers to Buy or Sell

Although there is some authority to the contrary, it is generally held that offers to buy or sell real estate are not admissible to prove the value of the property.

It is said in some cases that bona fide offers to purchase land at a named price, which the owner has declined, are admissible to prove the value of the land;[37] but the weight of authority[38] is that such evidence is not admissible.[39] The analysis made in Corpus Juris that an offer to pay a certain amount for property does not necessarily involve an estimate that such is its full value, and therefore should not be received, as against the owner, for the purpose of establishing that the value is less than he claims,[40] but that such an offer does involve an estimate that the land is worth at least as much as the amount offered, and is therefore relevant to show, on behalf of the owner, that the land is worth not less than such amount,[41] has been followed in a number of decisions. It has been held that the admissibility of evidence of rejected offers to purchase realty rests in the court's discretion.[42]

In any event, an offer to purchase real estate at a certain price is not admissible to prove the value of the property if the offer is not shown to be bona fide,[43] and made by one able to perform.[44] Mere negotiations,[45] or willingness to buy,[46] not ripening into an offer, are not admissible. The testimony of a witness that he would not be willing to buy property in its present condition cannot be received.[47]

Reasons for rule

(1) Evidence of offers to buy is too easily manufactured.

(2) The difficulty of determining whether or not an unaccepted offer was made in good faith requires the rejection of such evidence.

Wash.—Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Alexander, 91 P. 626, 47 Wash. 131.

(3) Such testimony simply gives the opinion of the offeror as to the value of the land.

(4) The admission of such evidence would raise a collateral issue.—In re Proceedings to Acquire Lands, etc., for Public Park, 150 A. 387, 107 N.J Law 110.

(5) "An unaccepted offer of this kind may be influenced by so many considerations entirely foreign to such an issue, and may put the opposing party at such disadvantage affording him, as it does, no fair opportunity to either anticipate or combat it."—Baynham v. State Highway Department, 187 S.E. 528, 535, 181 S.C. 435.

Impeachment of witness

In action for compensation for land appropriated for street, question asked witness as to offer to buy plaintiff's land is competent, if at all, only to contradict or impeach his estimate of value.—Lloyd v. Town of Venable, 84 S.E. 855, 168 N.C. 531.

Offer by witness not knowing market value was properly excluded on question of value.—Horine v. Cox, 139 S.E. 591, 37 Ga.App. 216.

Taking of option to purchase property at a specified price is not evidence of the real or market value of such property.—Shebley v. Quatman, 134 P. 68, 66 Or. 441.

Offer made during trial

In suit to set aside husband's conveyance of realty to wife, evidence that over a month before the trial plaintiffs offered to pay defendants an amount in cash, give them the year's crop from the premises, cancel all claims against husband, and to assume the encumbrances against the property for a deed thereto, was admissible on the question of value of the property, where the offer was made at the trial.—Safford v. Flynn, 274 N.W. 461, 133 Neb. 213.

In action for damages for preventing sale, bona fide offer of purchase may be shown on issue of extent of damage, but such evidence is inadmissible to prove market value in action where alleged damage is mere depreciation in market value.—Kilbourne v. McAllister, 65 P.2d 516, 179 Okl. 267.

would have sold his property is influenced by too many fortuitous circumstances to be relevant on an inquiry as to value,[49] but it has also been held that such evidence is admissible.[50] An offer to sell at a certain price may be treated as an admission and, as such, admissible against the owner.[51]

d. Appraisals and Assessments

Although there is some contrary authority, it is generally held that assessments made for purposes of taxation are not admissible to prove the value of land for other purposes.

Although there is some authority to the contrary,[52] the majority of the decisions[53] hold that a valuation of real estate made by public officials for the purpose of taxation is not relevant to aid a jury in determining the value of land[54] or buildings,[55] especially when the assessment is for a time remote from the time in issue.[56] The tax paid is likewise

Deficiency judgment proceeding

On an application for a deficiency judgment under a statute authorizing the court to determine market value by "affidavit or otherwise," an assessment is some evidence of value; it is fixed as the result of the sworn opinion of a deputy commissioner and is probably more accurate than the unsworn appraisals likely to be submitted by interested parties.—President, etc., of Manhattan Co. v. Admissibility of assessments of personal property to prove value see infra § 183 d.

Reason for rule

(1) Testimony showing the assessed valuation cannot be received by the court to show the actual value of property unless supported by other evidence, as it is a matter of common knowledge that property is very often assessed at an amount which is quite different from its actual value.
U.S.—Emerson v. U. S., 76 Ct.Cl. 613.
Colo.—Bankers Trust Co. v. International Trust Co., 113 P.2d 656.

(2) An assessment is merely an ex parte statement made by an officer not subject to cross-examination.

Utah.—Littledike v. Wood, 255 P. 172, 69 Utah 323.

Parties other than owner and assessor

(1) The production of assessment rolls, showing the assessed value, is not any evidence of market value, as between parties other than the owner and the assessing municipality.
Del.—Beck v. Kulesza, 156 A. 346, 4 W.W.Harr. 559.
N.H.—Beers v. Davidson, 125 A. 260, 81 N.H. 326.
Wash.—American State Bank v. Butts, 191 P. 754, 111 Wash. 612, 17 A.L.R. 168.

(2) The value placed by the board of supervisors in passing on the assessment roll on land in the vicinity of a particular tract is no evidence of the value of such particular tract on owner's appeal from order fixing the value of such land for taxation.—Caston v. Board of Sup'rs of Covington County, Miss., 93 So. 582.

Testimony that property was assessed at certain per cent of its value was incompetent where witness's knowledge of the value of land was limited to the assessment rolls.—Littledike v. Wood, 255 P. 172, 69 Utah 323.

Statutory provision for admission of assessment on question of value is inapplicable to trials had since effective date of Official Code in which such statute was omitted.—Day v. Adkins, 164 S.E. 238, 112 W. Va. 322.

Different owner

In an action for the destruction by fire of plaintiff's cottage, due to the alleged negligence of the employees of defendant gas company in connecting the gas pipes, it was not error to exclude tax lists as evidence of the value of the property destroyed, where another owned the property when the lists were made up.—Peterson v. Tidewater Power Co., 111 S.E. 8, 183 N C. 243.

Impeachment of witness

Testimony as to tax officer's valuation of property on cross-examination of another witness, testifying as to market value thereof, was not admissible as admission or declaration against interest.—Edmondson v. Carroll, Tex.Civ.App., 65 S.W. 2d 1107, error dismissed.

Evidence held not necessary

In an action wherein overhead expenses are involved and such expenses include taxes paid, although a witness testified as to the tax, records to show the value of land were not necessary.—United Iron Works v. L. J. Smith Const. Co., 227 P. 369, 116 Kan. 482.

inadmissible to prove the value of the land.[57]

The amount for which the owner has assessed or valued the land for tax purposes has been held inadmissible to prove the value of the land,[58] but other decisions hold that such evidence is admissible against the owner,[59] especially if his statement was made under oath.[60]

Betterment and condemnation assessments. Betterment assessments are not relevant on an issue as to value,[61] and the same is true of assessments made by condemnation commissioners.[62]

Appraisals. An estimate of value made by appraisers cannot affect a party who neither cooperates in nor subsequently ratifies the appointment of the appraisers;[63] but a party may be affected by the report of appraisers appointed by himself.[64]

e. Rental Value and Revenue

The rental value of, and the revenue derived from, land are admissible to prove the value of the land.

The rental value of real estate is admissible as showing the value of the property.[65] Changes in rental value are relevant to prove a change in the value of the land.[66] Accordingly, a general decrease in rental value of premises along the line of an elevated railroad and near the premises in question is competent in determining damage caused by its construction and operation;[67] but a decrease in the rental value of adjacent property is irrelevant when such decrease is not shown to be general in the vicinity.[68] All relevant matters may be considered in determining rental value or the value of a lease.[69] Although there is contrary authori-

Value of grass

(1) When land trespassed on by defendant's sheep is pasture land, proof of its rental value is admissible to show the value of the grass.—Hanson v. Seawell, 204 P. 660, 35 Idaho 92.

(2) In lessee's action for flooding land, amount of rental is immaterial in determining value of grass or hay.—Brown v. Jones, 278 P. 981, 130 Or. 424.

(3) In an action against a railroad company for damages, the contention that the value of the grass burned should be determined by what rental other persons paid for pasture land is not tenable, since what plaintiff and others paid per acre may or may not have been the value of the land for pasturage or other purposes at the time of making the rental contract, and at the time of the fire the value of the grass might have been more or less than the rental price.—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Harris, Tex.Civ.App., 216 S.W. 430.

(4) The rent paid by plaintiff for pasture could not determine the market value of grass destroyed by fire, but, if there was no market value, the rent might be a circumstance to be considered in arriving at the value of the grass for the purpose for which it was intended.—Chicago, R. Rental value of a prospective lease may be shown by its market value, or by the rent actually obtained by the owner if he exercised reasonable diligence in obtaining all the rent possible.—Branning Mfg. Co. v. Norfolk-Southern R. Co., 121 S.E. 74, 138 Va. 43.

Value of particular crops grown on land is not admissible as showing cash rental value thereof.—Miles v. Johanson, 238 P. 291, 40 Idaho 782.

ty,[70] it is generally held that the rent paid is admissible to prove rental value.[71] Where the rental agreement was made at a time remote from the time in issue, it is not relevant to prove rental value.[72]

Revenue. The net revenue arising from the use of land may be shown on an issue as to the value of the property;[73] but evidence as to the earnings of a business conducted on the land is not admissible to prove the value of the land.[74] However, evidence as to the market value of the crops the land was suited to raise has been held admissible to prove the value of the land.[75]

f. Time to Which Evidence of Value Must Relate

Evidence, to be admissible where the value of realty is in issue, must relate to the time as of which the property is to be valued.

Evidence on an issue as to the value of real estate, in order to be relevant, must relate to the time as of which the value of the property is to be determined,[76] or to a time so near thereto that it may reasonably throw light on the value at such time;[77] and evidence of value at a time considerably before[78] or after[79] the time to which the controversy relates is not admissible, unless it also appears that

Lease on different terms

(2) The rent stipulated in a lease by a city of premises for the purpose of a public garage is evidence of the value of the property when so used, when the tenant who remains in possession after a constructive eviction arising from the refusal of the city to permit the erection of such garage seeks to recover his damages arising from such breach as a counterclaim in an action against it for the rent reserved.—City of New York v. Pike Realty Corp., 160 N.E. 359, 247 N.Y. 245, reversing 222 N.Y.S. 785, 220 App.Div. 824, followed in 238 N.Y.S. 808, 227 App.Div. 577.

Value of crops before and after injury to land

In a tenant's action to recover damages for drainage of moisture from his land, evidence regarding the value of his crops before and after the drainage is admissible to show the land's usable value, and as to whether plaintiff used proper efforts to reduce the damages.—Baumann v. c. Offers to buy or sell
d. Appraisals and assessments
e. Time and place to which evidence of value must relate

a. In General

Where the value of personal property is in issue, the evidence should be limited to proof of its market value. Where the property involved has no established market value, its value may be proved by evidence as to all matters concerning the property which a reasonable buyer or seller would consider.

As a general rule, where the value of personal property is in issue, the evidence should be directed to its market value rather than to its intrinsic value;[81] it is usually considered that actual or intrinsic value can be shown only where the property has no market value.[82] Where, however, the property in controversy has no established market value, other evidence must necessarily be resorted to to prove its value,[83] and it has been considered that where goods are kept for use and not for sale, their actual value may be shown without first showing that they have no market value.[84] Where the issue is as to the value of personal property which has no readily ascertainable market value, evidence is admissible as to all matters with respect to the property which a reasonable buyer or seller would consider.[85] Ev-

22 C.J. p 183 note 7.

Place of market value

In an action by an automobile owner against a railroad company for destroying the automobile, where there was no market value for it at or near the place of the accident, the owner had a right to prove its intrinsic value, although there was a market for it in an adjoining county.—San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Liggett, Tex.Civ.App., 252 S.W. 191.

Property which cannot be sold

Insurer of property including liquors against theft cannot contend that there was no liability under the policy by reason of theft of intoxicating liquor while war time prohibition was in effect, in that such liquors then had no value, since such liquor did have value, although it could not be sold, and, there being no other evidence thereof, it was permissible for insured to testify as to what he paid for the liquors.—Chicago Bonding & Insurance Co. v. Oliner, 115 A. 592, 139 Md. 408, 18 A.L.R. 1081.

Tex.—London & Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Higgins, Civ.App., 68 S.W.2d 1056, error dismissed.
22 C.J. p 183 note 11.

Second-hand property

(1) The value of second-hand property is established in the same way as that of other property without market value; and accordingly evidence of its cost, its market price when new, and its usefulness and present condition, is admissible.

(2) Value of used household effects, destroyed by fire, must be determined from owner's sworn estimate of its fair and reasonable value to him in light of original cost, manner of use, etc.—Black v. Nabarrette, Tex.Civ.App., 281 S.W. 1087.

Probable selling price

(1) Where it is impossible to establish a general selling price of goods sold, the actual market value may be shown in buyer's action against seller for nondelivery by proof of facts and circumstances fixing to a reasonable degree of certainty the amount the property would idence as to the history,[86] character,[87] cost,[88] cost | of replacement,[89] and evidence as to or relating to bring if offered at ordinary sale.—Seward v. Pennsylvania Salt Mfg Co. 109 A. 617, 266 Pa. 457.

(2) Where carrier loses property which has no recognized market price, the price at which that specific shipment will sell at destination determines its value for purpose of determining damages.—Allen v. Adams Express Co., 77 Pa.Super. 174.

Value in good condition

In determining market value of staple commodity in bad condition, its market value at same time and place in good condition is to be considered.—Collins & G. R. Co. v. Beasley, 136 S.E. 167, 36 Ga.App. 241.

Ship under requisition

The value of a ship which was under requisition by the government during the war at the time she was sunk by a collision must be predicated on that fact, the test not being what would be a fair value between private litigants, if it had not been under requisition.—The Cushing, D.C. N.Y., 285 F. 617, modified on other grounds, C.C.A., 292 F. 560, certiorari granted Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. Southern Pac. Co., 44 S.Ct. 133, 263 U.S. 696, 68 L.Ed. 511, order modified on other grounds 44 S.Ct. 135, 263 U.S. 681, 68 L.Ed. 504, and motion granted 44 S.Ct. 458, 265 U.S. 569, 68 L.Ed. 1184, affirmed 45 S.Ct. 465, 268 U.S. 146, 69 L.Ed. 890.

Food regulations

When it does not appear that the value of the article involved was in any way affected by the United States food regulations, they cannot be considered in determining such value.—Glynn Canning Co. v. E. L. Adams Co., 106 S.E. 207, 26 Ga.App. 365.

Absence of complaint as to quality

In action against banks receiving draft for collection, for negligence, enabling drawee to obtain shipment of corn without payment, evidence that plaintiffs bought and resold corn as sound, heavy corn, and thought they would have heard if it had not been that kind of corn, and that there was a custom to claim credit in case of defective quality, was not competent on question of value of corn.—Mercantile Bank & Trust Co. v. Schuhart, Civ.App., 277 S.W. 1087, certified questions answered 277 S.W. 621, 115 Tex. 114.

Storage charge as showing quantity

In action on fire policy for value of tobacco destroyed by fire while stored in warehouse, warehouse owner's testimony as to amount of storage paid was admissible as showing amount of tobacco on storage so as to ascertain value thereof.—Boston Ins. Co. v. Faulkner, 89 S.W.2d 332, 262 Ky. 25.

Cost of thing is evidence of its value, especially where it appears that it is comparatively new, and where it has no established market value, as in the case of second-hand goods, lands not on the market, water in the ground, buildings, pipe lines laid in the ground, and the like.—Union Hollywood Water Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 195 P. 55, 184 Cal. 535.

Cost less depreciation, is evidence of value

U.S.—Westchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Bringle, C.C.A.Tenn., 86 F.2d 262.

Original cost is some evidence of replacement cost when determining damages for misrepresentations of quality of materials used in construction of amusement pier.—Crystal Pier Amusement Co. v. Cannan, 25 P.2d 839, 219 Cal. 184, 91 A.L.R. 1357.

Construction cost is admissible to prove value.—Wolfersberger v. Miller, 39 S.W.2d 758, 327 Mo. 1150.

Wholesale value

In action for conversion of property, permitting proof of wholesale value as relating to fair market value was proper.—Northern Rock Island Plow Co. v. Hackett-Gates-Hurty Co., 206 N.W. 446, 165 Minn. 282.

Building as personal property

In action for conversion of dwelling, cost of grading lot was not proper element in considering value of dwelling as personal property.—Brooks v. McDevitt, 11 P.2d 826, 40 Ariz. 221.

Bills paid for materials furnished by third persons were admissible on question of value of additions, although persons were not produced.—Kolmetsky v. Pellicoff, 141 A. 10, 6 N.J.Misc. 315, affirmed 143 A. 336, 105 N.J.Law 240.

Unless absence of market value is shown, testimony respecting reasonable value of bus when new was inadmissible.—Webb-North Motor Co. v. Ross, Tex.Civ.App., 42 S.W.2d 1086, error dismissed.

Where articles have established and regular market price shown by current sales, testimony as to the cost of making them is irrelevant, unless the market price has been inflated by unfair methods.—Wagoner Undertaking Co. v. Jones, 114 S.W. 1049, 134 Mo.App. 101.

Promise to pay reasonable value

In an action on a promise to pay the reasonable value of materials and labor furnished by plaintiff, evidence as to the cost of the same, as to the overhead of plaintiff's factory, and as to the necessary charge for profit is admissible.—Portland Pulley Co. v. Breeze, 199 P. 957, 101 Or. 239.

Proximity in time

In action for damages to personalty, unless too remote, evidence of cost of personalty is admissible.—Newton v. Wilder, 142 So. 831, 225 Ala. 339.

Court's discretion

Refusal to send to jury evidence as to cost price of various items entering into contract of sale of furnaces is within court's discretion.—Tate-Jones & Co. v. Union Electric Steel Co., 126 A. 813, 281 Pa. 448.

89. U.S.—Travelers Indemnity Co. v. Plymouth Box & Panel Co., C.C.A.N.C., 99 F.2d 218.

care,[90] actual[91] and possible[92] use, and condition[93] of the chattel may be considered by the jury in determining its value. The rental value of the chattel,[94] and the income that may be derived from its use,[95] may be shown; but merely sentimental elements of value cannot be considered.[96]

The evidence must be specific; testimony as to value based on averages, will not be received;[97] but where the value of a number of articles is in issue, it is not improper to admit evidence of the value of the property in gross without requiring a valuation of each article separately.[98]

Valuation by owner. The fact that the owner of chattels has placed a certain valuation on them is competent against him as an admission,[99] but cannot be used by him on his own behalf.[1] However, it has been held that the owner of property which has no established market value may testify as to the value of the property to him.[2]

Cost of repairs

(1) In action for injuries to automobile from collision testimony as to actual cost of repairs is admissible, as circumstance to be considered by jury in determining value of repairs.

Ga.—Lamon v. Perry, 125 S.E. 907, 33 Ga.App. 248.

(2) Evidence of amount paid to rebuild wall torn down in making street improvement is inadmissible, where it was not shown price paid was reasonable cost of restoration.—City of Hazard v. Combs, 16 S.W.2d 1022, 229 Ky. 222.

(3) In action by buyer at execution sale for conversion of personalty consisting of miniature golf course equipment, where owner's son, at owner's expense, procured materials and all items necessary to repair golf course, testimony of son as to cost of renovating the course, was admissible, since cost price testified to was cost price to the owner.—Winslow v. Einhorn, R.I., 2 A.2d 390.

Cost of reproduction as of date of valuation constitutes evidence properly to be considered in ascertainment of value.

Va.—Vaughan v. Mayo Milling Co., 102 S.E. 597, 127 Va. 148.

Depreciation allowance

(1) In determining the fair value of a ship sunk, depreciation should be deducted from the fair cost of reproduction, even though the value of ships was increasing, rather than depreciating, since the increased value was already allowed for in estimating the cost of reproduction.—The Cushing, D.C.N.Y., 285 F. 617, modified on other grounds, C.C.A., 292 F. 560, certiorari granted Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. Southern Pac. Co., 44 S.Ct. 123, 263 U.S. 696, 68 L.Ed. 511, order modified on other grounds 44 S.Ct. 135, 263 U.S. 681, 68 L.Ed. 504, and motion granted 44 S. Ct. 458, 265 U.S. 569, 68 L.Ed. 1184, affirmed 45 S.Ct 465, 268 U.S. 146, 69 L.Ed. 890.

(2) In determining the value of a ship, the full depreciation according to tables of ship depreciation need not be deducted from the cost of reproduction, where the vessel had been excellently maintained during the eighteen years of its service.—The Cushing, supra.

Discretion of court

In proceeding to assess damages for taking of coal wharf on harbor by commonwealth, evidence as to cost of reproducing filled land was within court's discretion to admit or exclude.—James Millar Co. v. Commonwealth, 146 N.E. 677, 251 Mass. 457.

Where insurers have right to replace property destroyed by fire by other property of similar kind and quality, replacement value of property is competent in determining the valuation of property.—Gechijian v. Richmond Ins. Co., 25 N.E.2d 191, 305 Mass. 132.

Book value

In action for damages to truck

Insurance. While, under particular circumstances, such evidence has been held admissible,[3] ordinarily the amount for which property is insured does not afford an inference as to value of sufficient probative effect to be admissible,[4] except, possibly, in cases where the owner is charged with fraud, misrepresentation, deceit, or bad faith.[5] The amount paid by the insurance company in settlement is generally not admissible to prove value,[6] but such evidence has been admitted.[7]

Bonds. Where bonds have no readily ascertainable market value, evidence as to the value of the property securing the bonds is admissible to prove the value of the bonds.[8] The par value of the bonds may be shown.[9]

b. Sales

Evidence of the price realized on a bona fide sale of personal property is generally admissible to prove the value of the chattel, unless the sale took place at a time remote from the time as of which the property is to be valued.

Evidence of what an article sold for in a bona fide transaction is relevant to prove value,[10] provided the sale took place at a time not too remote from the time as of which the personalty is to be valued.[11] It has been held that compulsory sales are not indicative of value,[12] and are not admissible,[13] particularly where the property was bought by the creditor who forced the sale,[14] although it tractor which was struck by bus, secretary and general manager of corporate owner of tractor were properly permitted to testify as to owner's valuation thereof immediately before accident, as against contention that valuation given was only book value, where book value was intended to represent real value as nearly as practicable.—Great Eastern Stages v. W. T. Cowan, Inc., 176 A. 613, 167 Md. 690.

Limitations of rule

In tort case, party whose personalty has been negligently destroyed or wrongfully taken from him can testify as to value of property to him only where proof shows that property did not have market or real value and could not be replaced or reproduced.—Pioneer Building & Loan Ass'n v. Buyer having peculiar interest

Value of collateral when sold in fall of 1927 could not be determined by what it was bartered for in spring of 1928 to one who had peculiar and personal interest in acquiring it.—Williams v. Herman, 249 N.W. 215, 216 Iowa 499.

Private sale

Evidence of price realized on a private sale of goods has no probative force on determining the market value of such goods.—Groves v. Warren, 135 N.E. 230, 233 N.Y. 160, reversing 183 N.Y.S. 949, 193 App. Div. 917—Hoagland Ligety Co. v. Finkelstein, 181 N.Y.S. 353.

Changed conditions

Evidence as to the price paid or offered for market stalls has no bearing on the value of rights in stalls for the remainder of a current year only, with all prospect of continuance beyond that time removed.—Mayor and Council of City of Baltimore v. Ercolano, 184 A. 164, 170 Md. 341.

has been held that under such circumstances, the sale is admissible as against the creditor's contention that the property was worth less than the price he paid.[15] On the other hand, evidence of the price realized on a forced sale has been held admissible,[16] at least where the purchaser was a third party who had no part in forcing the sale.[17]

Auction sale. The price realized at an auction sale of personal property is admissible to prove its value, if the sale is fairly conducted with suitable effort to attract bidders,[18] and is made sufficiently near the time involved in the issue.[19] The price realized has been held admissible even though the auction was a forced one, held under judicial authority,[20] but, as to this, there is contrary authority.[21]

Price paid. While, in particular circumstances, the price paid by the owner of the chattel has been held inadmissible to prove the value of the chattel at the time under consideration,[22] it is more commonly held that such evidence is admissible.[23] To be admissible, the purchase must have been at a

Cost of procuring promised chattel
Where vendor failed to furnish certain articles he had agreed to put in house, and purchaser supplied them, in action to recover value thereof, evidence of cost of procuring them was relevant on question of such value.—Yoakam v. Hogan, 243 P. 21, 198 Cal. 16.

Exchange
(1) Cost of auto exchanged for that damaged is admissible to show the value of the damaged car.—Newton v. Wilder, 142 So. 831, 225 Ala. 339.

(2) The value of the property received may be shown as evidence of the value of the property given.—Carr v. Moore, 41 N.H. 131.

(3) In trover for a piano which defendant had taken in a trade for another and more valuable instrument, the amount allowed for the piano in suit is admissible evidence to show its value.—Wulschner-Stewart Music Co. v. Faulkner, 103 N.E. 665, 55 Ind.App. 208.

(4) Where evidence was conflicting as to price buyer was to pay for heifers, evidence of what seller paid for them a short time before was admissible as tending to show their value when he sold them to buyer, and fact that seller paid for them in part with other property did not af-

time not too remote from the time as of which the property is to be valued.[24] The admissibility of evidence as to the price paid is to be determined by considerations involving the exercise of a sound discretion, under all the circumstances,[25] and the evidence is more readily received when other evidence of value is apparently unavailable.[26]

Price received. It is generally held that the price received by the owner at a subsequent sale of the personalty is admissible to prove its value as of the time in dispute,[27] but there is authority apparently fect admissibility of such evidence.—Atwood v. Joyce, 192 A. 11, 109 Vt. 30.

Fixed prices

(1) When new motor vehicles are universally sold at a fixed price, evidence of what plaintiff paid for his vehicle when new shows its market value at that time.—Texas Power & Light Co. v. Hale, Tex.Civ.App., 276 S.W. 746.

(2) On the other hand, it is held that in an action for breach of warranty by delivering a "light six" automobile instead of a "special six" as ordered, the difference between the list price of such cars at the date of the sale is not proper evidence of the actual difference in value of the two cars at such time.—Harris v. Weber Motor Car Co., 251 S.W. 121, 212 Mo.App. 107.

W.Va.—Gorby v. Bridgeman, 99 S.E. 88, 83 W.Va. 727.

In connection with other evidence

Evidence as to what owner paid for an automobile is evidence of its value in connection with his other testimony as to condition of automobile, distance it had been operated, etc.—Tatro v. Baker-Fisk-Hugill Co., 184 N.W. 449, 215 Mich. 623.

Invoice price paid for imported merchandise was some evidence of market value.—U. S. v. Sabin, 12 Ct. Cust.App. 520, rehearing denied 13 Ct.Cust App. 161.

Value as represented

In tort action for fraud in sale of automobile, price paid by buyer for automobile could properly be considered as evidence of value of automobile if it had been as represented by seller.—Currier v. Ames, 4 A.2d 340, 110 Vt. 254.

Auction sale

That automobile sold for four hundred and seventeen dollars and fifty cents at public auction twenty days after it was wrongfully replevined is some evidence of its market value at time it was replevined, where there was no evidence that sale was not fairly conducted.—Securities Inv. Co. v. White, 91 S.W. 2d 581, 19 Tenn.App. 540.

Evidence as to price realized should be supplemented by proof that the sale was made at the best price obtainable and represents the market value.—Kingston Braid Mills v. Aboff, 179 N.Y.S. 127.

Opinion of value

In action on fire policy, evidence of price for which whole of salved machines and machinery was sold was held admissible on question of value after fire, although such evidence, standing alone, is merely an opinion of value.—Non-Royalty Shoe Co. v. Phœnix Assur. Co., Limited, of London, England, 210 S.W. 37, 277 Mo. 399, modifying, App., 178 S.W. 246.

Place of sale

Where oleo-stearine was sold to be resold and shipped to Portugal, but it did not accord with specifications, and was directed resold with the consent of the shipper, and it appeared that the resale in Portugal was fair, being made by an experienced broker, and the best possible price obtained, evidence as to the price on resale, offered on the question of damages, is admissible, despite objection that the witness knew nothing of market conditions, for the price obtained would establish the market condition.—Smith, De Macedo & Co. v. Swift & Co., 110 A. 141, 267 Pa. 365.

Receiver's report

Court did not err in admitting in evidence the report of a receiver, who under appointment of the court took charge of the subject-matter of the suit, such report showing the amount obtained at the sale of the receiver for said property, where court instructed that the amount of the sale by the receiver could only to the contrary.[28]

Agreement as to price. In an action between the parties to a sale of or contract to sell personal property, the price fixed in such transaction is admissible to prove the value of the property.[29] It has been held that the contract price is not admissible to prove value as against one not a party to the contract,[30] but, under certain circumstances, such evidence has been held admissible.[31]

c. Offers to Buy or Sell

Although there is some authority to the contrary, offers to buy or sell personal property at a named price are generally not admissible as evidence of the value of the property.

Offers to buy. According to some authorities offers to buy personal property at a price named, made in good faith and rejected by the owner, are admissible as evidence of value.[32] On the other hand, however, there is considerable authority for the view that offers to buy personal property cannot be shown on an issue as to its value.[33] In any event, an offer by one not shown to be ready, willing, and able to make a purchase is not admissible;[34] nor is an offer made at a time remote from be considered as illustrating the value of the property at the time in question.—Kay v. Benson, 108 S.E. 779, 152 Ga. 185.

Sale after repairs made

(1) In an action by an owner of an automobile for damages in a collision, exclusion of evidence of the cost of repairs and the price brought by the automobile at a sale after being repaired was error, since they were elements tending to show its value after the injury.—Madden v. Nippon Auto Co., 206 P. 569, 119 Wash. 618.

(2) It was not error to admit evidence that defendants after making some repairs on the car sold it to another purchaser at original sale price, as such evidence tended to show its value.—Graves v. Negy, 219 P. 286, 114 Kan. 373.

Sale by converter

(1) In action for conversion of equipment and machinery, rejection of offer of proof as to amount realized on wrongdoer's sale of equipment and machinery was not error.—Weber v. West Seattle Land & Improvement Co., 63 P.2d 418, 188 Wash. 512.

(2) In action for conversion, evidence as to the price received for the goods by defendant, although not conclusive as to the market value, is admissible as some evidence of value.—Flinn v. Springsteel, 182 N.Y.S. 17, 191 App.Div. 769.

Trade in allowance

Where a damaged automobile was traded for a new car, it was held that the amount allowed defendant was properly admitted but that evidence of various other trades thereafter of the damaged car was not admissible to show its value.—Smith v. Fisher, 11 Tenn.App. 273.

30. Ga.—Downs v. Berryman, 100 S.E. 226, 24 Ga.App. 170.

31. Absence of market

Where plaintiff, suing for damages to a shipment of seed peas, was a dealer in seed peas, and his method was to contract a year ahead for their sale, and then in turn contract with farmers to raise the peas, and such was the general practice, and although a certain percentage of seed peas had a spot market, there was no general quotation on prices, the price fixed in the contract of sale thereof was some evidence as to their value.—Feelyater v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 190 N.W. 193, 178 Wis. 362.

Cost of replacement

In an action against a carrier for the loss of high explosive shells manufactured by plaintiff under a contract with one having a contract with the British government, the amount which the government had contracted to pay, although not conclusive, was admissible on the question of actual value, as tending to show the cost of replacement.—Woonsocket Machine & Press Co. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 131 N.E. 461, 239 Mass. 211.

Later contract for same work can only be taken as evidence of reasonable value of materials, to extent that both contracts substantially correspond.—Milwaukee Bldg. Co. v. Wetzel, 270 P. 382, 93 Cal.App. 775.

Offers to buy:
Real property see supra § 182 c.
Similar property see infra § 593.

Offer by dealer

An offer for an article is ordinarily of doubtful value as evidence of its market value although an offer by a reputable dealer who is endeavoring to purchase for his own account at the lowest possible price with the expectation of being able to resell at a profit in the regular course of business may be competent, although by no means conclusive, evidence.—Youssoupoff v. Widener, 158 N.E. 64, 246 N.Y. 174, affirming 219 N.Y.S. 942, 219 App.Div. 712, which affirms 215 N.Y.S. 24, 126 Misc. 491.

"Posted prices," while not controlling, are admissible on issue of field price of crude oil where coupled with proof of absence of sales.—St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Pure Oil Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 63 F.2d 771, reversing, D.C., 58 F.2d 393.

Trade-in allowance

Evidence of allowance offered on automobile held admissible to determine value of automobile when stolen.—Cunningham v. Holzmark, 37 S.W.2d 956, 225 Mo.App. 762, motion overruled 47 S.W.2d 1097.

Offer to buy part of property

Where a witness was permitted to state the market value of the lumber, it was not error to exclude evidence as to offers for portions of it, especially where the offers related only to the higher grades of the lumber.—Batte Bros. v. Battle, 213 S.W. 379, 139 Ark. 302.

the time in issue admissible.[35]

Offers to sell. Offers to sell at a certain price, no sale being actually consummated, are not evidence of value,[36] except possibly against the person making the offer, as an admission.[37]

d. Appraisals and Assessments

Appraisals and assessments of personal property are not admissible to prove the value of the chattels, except possibly as an admission against a party who participated in the appraisal or assessment.

Evidence of estimates in an appraisal of personal property made by one whose action does not legally affect the party against whom the evidence is offered is not admissible to prove the value of the property,[38] even if the appraisal is officially made;[39] but where an appraisal can be deemed the act of a party its results are admissible against him.[40]

Assessments. An assessment for taxation is not competent evidence of the value of personalty,[41] unless it is based on a statement furnished by the owner, in which case it is admissible against him,[42] but not in his favor.[43]

e. Time and Place to Which Evidence of Value Must Relate

Evidence of value, to be admissible, must relate to the time and place as of which the personal property involved is to be valued.

Where the issue of value of personal property is involved in an action, it is usually with respect to the value at some particular time,[44] and hence evidence of value is relevant only when directed to value at the time in question,[45] or at a time so near thereto that it may reasonably be expected to throw some light on the value at such time.[46] It follows

Report of appraisers in bankruptcy
"The Supreme Court of the United States has not yet decided whether the report of the appraisers of a bankrupt's estate is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing the value of the bankrupt's property prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. . . . We agree . . that such reports should not be admitted in evidence for that purpose. . . . By introducing their report and not the appraisers themselves, the opposing litigant is deprived of the opportunity of cross-examining the appraisers, and ascertaining the method pursued by them in arriving at the value placed by them on the property."—Bank of Forest v. However, in an action by landlord, who had rent lien on tenant's mortgaged chattels, against a chattel mortgagee and mortgagee's sureties for breach of a claim and delivery bond, testimony of one, who had appraised the property in question, although not binding on defendants, was held competent evidence as going to prove the value of the property.—Maynard v. Decline in value
Where witness testified that he did not remember what the price of maize was on the date defendant refused to accept plaintiff's maize, Jan. 14, 1921, his testimony that between Sept. 13, 1920, and the middle of January, 1921, the market value of maize declined from thirty to fifty cents per hundred held inadmissible, such an estimate being merely a guess.—Farmers' Mill & Elevator Co. v. Hodges, Tex.Com.App., 260 S.W. 166, reversing, Civ.App., 248 S.W. 72.

Shipping season
In action against carrier for delay in shipping material to be used for shipment of citrus fruit, evidence as to date of closing of citrus fruit shipping season is admissible to illustrate value of material at time of arrival at destination.—Atlantic Coast Line R. that evidence of value a considerable time before or after the time in question is not admissible,[47] in the absence of further evidence showing either that the value remained the same,[48] or the comparative values on the two occasions.[49] On the other hand, it has been held that evidence of value at a time several months from the time in controversy is receivable without evidence that the condition of property remained the same during the intervening period, where there is no suggestion by the adverse party of any change.[50] It has been held that the determination of whether or not the evidence is

Variation in value as affecting only weight

In shipper's cross action against carrier to recover value of cedar posts which had been rejected by consignee and sold by carrier, based on alleged negligence of carrier in failing to secure a fair price, where authority to sell was given on April 8, and sale was made on April 21, evidence as to value of posts in March at place posts were rejected, and also at place where sold, was admissible, since variance between values on different dates went only to weight of testimony.—Reed v. Southern Pac. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 99 S.W.2d 1026, error dismissed.

Condition must have remained substantially the same in order to authorize introduction of invoice in evidence to show value.—Moore v. Hutchinson, 148 S.E. 78, 107 W.Va. 275.

To show the value of a patent at a particular time, evidence of its value at other times is admissible.—Hills v. Skagit Steel & Iron Works, 210 P. 17, 122 Wash. 22.

Fluctuating market

Market value of peanuts on one date is some circumstantial evidence of market value on a very near later date in spite of fluctuations of market as it is presumed to remain constant for at least brief periods.—Farm Products Co. v. Eubanks, 116 S.E. 327, 29 Ga.App. 604.

Value of foreign currency

Where an agreement of purchase by plaintiff and sale by defendants of twenty thousand Austrian kronen in the form of currency provided for delivery with accrued interest at three per cent per annum, on plaintiff giving defendants three months' notice, which notice was given April 12, 1917, but defendants did not perform on July 12, 1917, there being then no available market for kronen in this country, it was held that the price of kronen in 1919 was entirely too remote, and that the market price of April, 1917, was admissible as being the nearest available quotation of the fair indication of their market value when defendants broke the contract.—Melzer v. Zimmerman, 194 N.Y.S. 222, 118 Misc. 407.

Eight years

In action against storage company for failure to deliver goods in 1919, evidence of values in 1911, when stored, held relevant where defendant storage company lost goods, so that evidence of values at time of default was unavailable.—Barrett v. Fournal, C.C.A.N.Y., 21 F.2d 298.

One year

(1) Evidence as to the value of defendant's car almost a year after an accident was properly excluded in action for damages.—Larson v. Long, 219 P. 1066, 74 Colo. 152.

(2) Evidence of value of machinery after it was a year old, was held not to prove what its value was when it was new.—Avery Co. of Texas v. Harrison Co., Tex.Civ.App., 254 S.W. 1015, reversed on other grounds, Com.App., 267 S.W. 254.

Testimony as to automobile's value nine months prior to destruction without reference to its condition at time and place of destruction was held inadmissible.—Pate v. Smith, 261 P. 189, 128 Okl. 29.

One month

In an action for damages for breach of a contract to buy cocoanut oil, where the breach occurred April 27, the trial court was not clearly wrong in striking out testimony by a witness as to the price of oil fixed by a contract on April 1 of that year.—E. Changed condition

(1) In an action for the purchase price of machinery where it had remained in defendant's plant unused and unattended since its installation, testimony as to its present value was properly excluded because, under such conditions, the testimony would not show its value when installed and in working condition.—Howe v. Fulton, 225 Ill.App. 589.

(2) Where parts of automobile delivered for repairs were distributed around shop among other like parts, so that it was impracticable, without putting the parts together again, to give an opinion as to value of the machine, and the owner brought trover, claiming that it was kept for an unreasonable time, and that on demand he offered to pay charges, evidence as to its value when left and a week or a month prior thereto was admissible in determining its highest market value between the conversion and the trial, where defendant neither pleaded nor proved any change in its condition after delivery to him.—Sisson v. Roberts, 104 S.E. 910, 25 Ga.App. 725.

(3) Where evidence showed use and condition of automobile between time witness last saw it and day it burned, his testimony as to its value just before loss was relevant.—Continental Auto Ins. Ass'n v. Traywick, 101 So. 614, 211 Ala. 659.

too remote rests in the court's discretion,[51] and should be determined in the light of all of the surrounding circumstances including the nature of the property involved.[52]

Place. Where the value of personal property is in issue, the inquiry is usually as to its value at some particular place, and evidence of value, to be relevant, must be directed to the value of the property at that place.[53] If property has a market value at the place involved in the inquiry, evidence is properly directed to establishing it at that place.[54] Where it appears that no market value for a commodity exists at the place involved in the inquiry, market value at other places may be shown, if these are sufficiently near to show, in connection with cost of transportation, etc., the value at the place in question,[55] and if this market is one legally open to the parties.[56] The question as to what places are sufficiently near is addressed to the sound discretion of the court,[57] the determining consideration being what evidence is practically available to the litigants.[58] The nearest market, if it is fairly illustrative, is usually demanded by the court,[59] and relevancy decreases as distance increases;[60] but nearness is not conclusive where circumstances of variation render the value at the nearer market misleading,[61] and value at a market a great distance away may be shown where it appears that market value is the same in both places, or differs only by the cost of transportation.[62] Value in the controlling market may always be shown, whatever its distance.[63] Where the issue involved relates to the sale and delivery of goods, evidence of value is properly directed to value at the place of delivery,[64] but unless the evidence is clear and explicit as to the value of the article at the place of delivery evidence of value at other places may be received.[65]

f. Corporate Stock

Where corporate stock has no established market value, evidence of the assets, liabilities, and other matters pertinent to the worth of the corporation is admissible to prove the value of the stock.

Evidence of the market value of corporate stock is admissible to prove its value.[66] Evidence as to

Taking coal; expense of removal
In trespass for wrongfully entering under plaintiff's property and mining coal, the amount of deduction from the value of the coal at the mouth of the pit, to which defendant was entitled in determining damages for the coal taken, was the cost of loading and hauling to the foot of the shaft, and the hoisting and dumping it into the car at the top.—Smothers v. Elements of value

(1) Value of stock closely held and not listed should be determined by considering assets, liabilities, profits, good will, etc.—In re Schlossman's Adm'x, 242 N.Y.S. 417, 136 Misc. 893.

(2) The value of corporate common stock having no market value was ascertained by deducting from the net value of corporate assets, tangible and intangible, including value of leaseholds and good will, the value of outstanding preferred stock and dividing the remainder by the number of shares of common stock.—Pett v. Spiegel, 202 N.Y.S. 650.

(3) In action by stockholders of subsidiary corporation, in corporate right, to recover damages from directors of allied corporations who caused subsidiary to issue shares and sell them to allied corporation, which sold the shares to parent corporation, value of shares must be determined from number of shares sold, market conditions, rate of return on shares, history and prospects of subsidiary, its financial condition, and other relevant facts.—Cleary v. Higley, 277 N.Y.S. 63, 154 Misc. 158, affirmed 284 N.Y.S. 989, 246 App.Div. 698.

Book value

(1) Market value increases in corporate stock held by corporation should be deducted from capital and surplus in computing book value—In re Marvin's Estate, 241 N.Y.S. 500, 135 Misc. 899.

(2) To ascertain book value of common stock it was error to use market value of seventy-five dollars per share for preferred stock, instead of par value of one hundred dollars per share.—Newell v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, C.C.A., 66 F.2d 102.

(3) Book value of stock and financial statements of corporation were not admissible to show value of stock where corporation was a family corporation, since value of stock to anyone outside of family was problematical.—Merriam v. Wimpfheimer, D.C.N.Y., 25 F.Supp. 405.

Liquidating value

In action for value of stock by stockholder dissenting to transfer of assets of building and loan association, court properly refused to take market or liquidating value as basis for valuing plaintiff's stock.—Ferrando v. U. S. Nat. Building & Loan Ass'n, 160 A. 716, 307 Pa. 25.

Contracts held by corporation

(1) In determining market value of stock, commission contracts of corporation were properly omitted, where expiration dates thereof were not shown.—Horn v. J. O. Nessen Lumber Co., 236 Ill.App. 187.

(2) In determining value of stock of lumber company, profits on orders to be filled should be considered.—Horn v. J. O. Nessen Lumber Co., supra.

Intercorporate item

That asset or liability item on corporation's books was due from or to subsidiary was held not to warrant elimination thereof in valuing corporation's stock—In re Auditore's Estate, 240 N.Y.S. 502, 136 Misc. 664, affirmed In re Auditore's Will, 250 N.Y.S. 902, 233 App.Div. 740, appeal dismissed In re Parascandola, 178 N.E. 792, 257 N.Y. 554.

The report of a commercial agency is not competent to prove the value of the stock of a corporation.[83]

Where the value of the property of a corporation at a certain date is in issue, evidence of actual results in the way of profits, ascertained years after such date, is not admissible.[84]

The par value of the stock may be shown[85] by the printed subscription blanks used by the corporation,[86] stock certificates issued by it,[87] or the stock book of the corporation.[88]

Sales. Evidence as to the price at which the stock was purchased or sold is admissible to prove its value,[89] unless the sale was at a time remote from the time in issue.[90] In an action between buyer and seller the price fixed in the contract of sale is evidence of the value of the stock.[91]

g. Animals

In the absence of a readily ascertainable market value for the animal, its value may be proved by evidence of its breed, characteristics, and other qualities.

Where the value of an animal is in issue, evidence as to its intrinsic value is not admissible where the animal has a readily ascertainable market value at the time and place as of which it is to be valued.[92] In the absence of such market value, evidence as to the intrinsic value of the animal is admissible,[93] and it is permissible to show its breed,[94] pedigree,[95] qualities,[96] characteristics,[97]

Value two months later
A showing of the capital net worth of corporation on December 31 was not proof of the corporation's net worth on November 6, so as to show book value of stock which was to be purchased as of November 6, the date of holder's death.—Shammah v. Empire Linen Importing Corporation, 20 N.Y.S.2d 797, 260 App.Div. 298.

Price stock had uniformly brought was some evidence of market value of stock transferred to director by stockholder.—Blabon v. Hay, 169 N. E. 268, 269 Mass. 401.

Property received in exchange
(1) Evidence of fair real value of stock received for other stock was held properly received to determine value for income tax purposes where exchange was made at peak of stock inflation which stock exchange sales registered.—Rogers v. Strong, C.C. A.N.J., 72 F.2d 455, certiorari denied Strong v. Rogers, 55 S.Ct. 217, 293 U.S. 621, 79 L.Ed. 709.

(2) In an action for deceit based on false representations as to value in the sale of certain telephone stock, it was not error to exclude evidence as to how much stock in another corporation plaintiff had received for the property of the corporation purchased by him at a receiver's sale. —Smith v. and earning power,[98] and to detail its record as a prize winner at various shows of fine stock.[99]

The price realized on a sale of the animal at or within a reasonable time before or after the time as of which the value of the animal is to be ascertained is admissible as evidence of its value.[1] Evidence as to offers to buy or sell an animal are not admissible to prove its value,[2] except perhaps under special circumstances.[3] The owner may not testify whether he had placed any value on the animal[4] or state at what price he was or is willing to sell it.[5]

§ 184. Services

The value of services may be proved by evidence of the agreed price, the nature of the work, and the result achieved.

In addition to a detailed statement of what was done, the value of personal services may be established circumstantially by proof of relevant facts calculated to show the real value of the services as charged,[6] their beneficial result[7] or lack of it,[8] their dangerous[9] or disgusting[10] character, and the degree of physical strength,[11] acquired skill,[12] or

In action for damage to carload of horses, evidence of price received at public auction where sale was fair and in good faith, was admissible as tending to prove value.—Vincent, Albin & Strahl v. Hines, 200 N.W. 1, 198 Iowa 1224.

Declining market

(1) Price received on declining market one year later for cattle injured by carrier's negligence could not be taken as basis on which to estimate impaired value.—Jennings v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 134 So. 694, 172 La. 522.

(2) In action for breach of warranty in sale of a jack, evidence as to decline in price between time of purchase and sale by buyers was admissible on question of value of jack at time of sale.—Coleman v. Sowders, 268 S.W. 579, 206 Ky. 841.

Indirect proof

Where plaintiff sold to defendant a boar and four gilts, receiving a note in part payment, but delivery of one of the gilts had not been made, in a suit on the note, evidence of the value of the boar and of the delivered gilts was inadmissible to show the value of the undelivered gilt for which defendant was entitled to an offset by deducting the value of the animals delivered from the sale price.—Clark v. Gustafson, 192 N.W. 760, 46 S.D. 329.

Mongrel stock; registered stock

(1) In an action for an injury to a fourteen-month-old heifer, evidence as to the price paid for it when it was four months old is admissible; in the case of mongrel stock such evidence would not be relevant, but when the value of the animal is principally in its breeding its sale price will reflect materially on its value at any time.—Budd v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 195 P. 1109, 59 Mont. 238.

(2) Even though the sale price of an animal of registered stock is admissible to prove its value a year later, objections were properly sustained to questions involving the expense of keeping the heifer for the period between the time it was bought when four months old and the time it was killed.—Budd v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., supra.

Place of sale

In a shipper's action for damages to live stock because of delay, evidence as to what plaintiffs paid for the cattle at the point of shipment was inadmissible as having no bearing on the market value at destination.—St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Freasier, Tex.Civ.App., 237 S.W. 344.

Opinion evidence as to value of services see infra §§ 501, 545.

Value of similar services see infra § 593.

Sale price of finished product

In action for work done and materials furnished in manufacture of vending machines, evidence as to price at which defendant contracted to sell machines was held properly admitted.—Pipe & Tube Bending Corporation of America v. Cornine-Hakanson Die-Casting Co., C.C.A.N.J., 27 F.2d 32.

Cost of building; architects' services

In determining value of services of architects suing prospective builders who abandoned contract, evidence of cost of building ultimately constructed by other builders was inadmissible.—Miller v. San Francisco Church Extension Soc. of M. E. Church, 13 P.2d 824, 125 Cal.App. 85.

Speculative evidence

In suit by partner for his share of profits of venture, purely speculative evidence as to what the work "could have been done for," or what it should have cost if done by another, is inadmissible.—Wilson v. Hunt, Tex.Civ.App., 270 S.W. 263.

Admissions

(1) Statements made by, or attributable to, a party, which amount to admissions as to the value of services, may be shown against such party.

Evidence of reputation

(1) Is not admissible to prove other qualifications required for success.[13] Where the value of professional services is in issue, the professional standing of the person rendering such services is relevant,[14] as is also evidence of the annual income of such person;[15] but evidence as to the reputation for ability of the person rendering the services and his success or failure on other jobs has been held to raise collateral issues and to be inadmissible to prove the value of the services.[16]

The contract price,[17] or the price actually paid,[18] for services is evidence of the value of the services. Evidence as to unaccepted offers to employ deceased are not admissible in a death action to establish the pecuniary worth of deceased.[19]

§ 185. Other Matters

The rule that evidence, to be admissible, must be relevant has been applied to a variety of matters.

The general rule, stated supra §§ 158, 159, that evidence directed toward the proof of any issue, to be admissible, must have a logical relation with the issue to be proved and must be of such probative force to establish the issue as to justify the expenditure by the court of the time required for its reception and consideration, has been applied to a variety of matters and issues.[20]

Evidence as to the value of the land promised for services is admissible on the question of the value of the services.—Lewis v. Mitchell, 153 S.E. 183, 200 N.C. 652.

Subsequent contract for same work

Later contract can only be taken as evidence of reasonable value of work left undone on breach of earlier contract, to extent that both contracts substantially correspond.—Milwaukee Bldg. Co. v. Wetzel, 270 P. 382, 93 Cal.App. 775.

Charge

In an action against an insurance company by a solicitor and collector for services in investigating claims, plaintiff's evidence that he put a charge of three dollars and fifty cents for each investigation, which "will cover all the travels that I had," did not prove value.—Cheek v. National Life Ins. Co. of United States of America, 207 S.W. 882, 200 Mo.App. 533.

In action on contract which fixed price, evidence as to reasonable value of work was irrelevant.—Asnon v. Foley, 288 P. 792, 105 Cal.App. 624.

20. Matter held relevant and admissible

(1) In an action on a note given for the purchase price of a motor truck, the defense being misrepresentations inducing the purchase, the fact that repairs to the truck had been made or were necessary within a short time after its purchase was competent and relevant evidence for defendant.—Zimmern v. Standard Motor Car Co., 88 So. 743, 205 Ala. 580.

(2) What the "mill run" of a mill had been while delivering over one million five hundred thousand feet of lumber is some evidence of what it would be while sawing the next one million four hundred thousand feet.—Pye v. Eagle Lake Lumber Co., 227 P. 193, 66 Cal.App. 584.

(3) When question for jury is cost of building, and it is shown that secondhand material entered into its construction, and party furnishing such material failed to make any showing as to its value and cost, he cannot complain because court permitted other party to offer testimony as to its value and allowed jury to consider the evidence in determining cost of building, evidence being under circumstance best evidence of cost.—Nittler-Rhump v. Jones, 199 N.W. 542, 112 Neb. 238.

(4) In an action involving whether a bank had received a draft by mail on or before May 1, letter containing draft being found in bank some time later, no one knowing when letter had arrived, evidence that many persons other than plaintiff had called at bank demanding delivery of checks contained in the same letter was material, the banker undertaking to recite facts to demonstrate that his attention before May 1 was called to the loss or delay of the letter, the fact that many persons were demanding checks tending to make bank employees observe all mail until the envelope was found, and tending to show that the letter must have arrived and been mislaid prior to May 1st.—Texas Co. v. Wimberly, Tex.Civ.App., 213 S.W. 286.

(5) In an action to recover cattle alleged to have been sold by an agent without authority, where agent claimed that he had authority to sell cattle to pay debts contracted for labor, etc., testimony of a witness tending to show that the agent had contracted debts was admissible, although the witness did not know what the contract between the owner and the agent was.—Peterson v. Clay, Tex.Civ.App., 225 S.W. 1112.

(6) Evidence of number of rows in field and number of ears in average row was competent to show weight of corn reported in connection with sale before husking was not correct.—Boss v. Brown, 294 P. 878, 132 Kan. 86.

(7) In action for injuries from falling down marble stairs, expert's testimony that swinging door at head of stairs swung over handrail and top step was admissible as against contention that it was im-

Race and status. On the question whether a person is a member of a particular race, it has been held competent to show general reputation,[21] his association with members of that race,[22] or the fact that he was treated, by a couple belonging to such race, as their child;[23] and, after the death of the person in question, his own statement as to his race has been held admissible.[24] Reputation has also been held admissible to establish whether a given individual is bond or free,[25] although this has been denied,[26] and hearsay from individuals, as distinguished from general reputation, is rejected.[27]

Pedigree of animals. It has been held that the pedigree of an animal may be proved by reputation,[28] but hearsay cannot be admitted for this purpose.[29]

Fairness in business transactions is a question of fact, provable by both direct and circumstantial evidence.[30]

Circumstantial evidence is admissible to prove the exchange of letters by due course of mail,[31] to prove how an injury occurred,[32] and to prove speed.[33]

VI. COMPETENCY GENERALLY

§ 186. In General

Evidence is inadmissible where it is incompetent, although its weakness or tendency to prejudice the adverse party does not render it incompetent. "Bloodhound evidence" has been held to be competent.

Evidence in a civil action or proceeding is inadmissible where it is incompetent or unfit for the purpose for which it is offered.[34] On the other hand, evidence is admissible where it is competent,[35] provided it is also relevant and material under the material, since plaintiff did not look for handrail.—Goldstein v. United Amusement Corporation, 169 A. 587, 86 N.H. 402.

Matter held irrelevant and inadmissible

(1) In action to recover amount due on contract of sale of growing crop, only issue involved being as to whether defendant had agreed to buy crop, evidence that plaintiff devised a ridiculous instrument, with which he cultivated the crop, was erroneously admitted, there being no question as to the condition of the crops at the time of the alleged sale. —Sexton v. Lockwood, Mo.App., 207 S.W. 856.

(2) On a motion for judgment on a sheriff's bond for failure to make money on an execution, where a traveling salesman testified that he heard the sheriff tell the judgment debtor that he had an execution to levy on certain goods, and that after the sheriff left without making the levy the salesman took some of the goods for a debt due his employers, a question as to whether the witness had handled a collection account for his employers for a resale of the goods back was not relevant to any issue involved.—Planters' Chemical & Oil Co. v. Daniel, 96 So. 424, 209 Ala. 363.

(3) Calculations as to number of bales of hemp that could be stored in compartment of certain dimensions, if competent, was held immaterial in action on policy of fire insurance.—National Union Fire Ins. Co. v. Forkner, 292 S.W. 765, 219 Ky. 119.

(4) Witness' statement of estimate of speed of automobile just before collision at curve was inadmissible as throwing no light on real issue of anticipation of accident.—Mercer Funeral Home v. Addison Bros. & Smith, 163 S.E. 439, 116 W.Va. 616.

(3) Commission of crime may be proved in civil actions without a trial first had in criminal courts.—Whychulis v. Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., 8 Pa.Dist. & Co. 73, 22 Sch.Leg.Rec. 110.

(4) In tracing a chain of title, all instruments affecting the record title are material and competent.—Moore v. Hoar, 81 P.2d 226, 27 Cal.App.2d 269.

Evidence held incompetent rules discussed §§ 158–185 supra. Evidence is not incompetent merely because it is weak.[36]

Circumstantial evidence in support of, or against, a proposition is equally competent with direct evidence.[37]

Trailing by bloodhounds. "Bloodhound evidence," that is, evidence of the conduct of a bloodhound, has been held to be competent and admissible in civil actions and proceedings, provided it is not valueless and a proper foundation is laid.[38] The rules governing the establishment of a proper foundation in civil actions are the same as those which control in criminal prosecutions.[39]

Evidence tending to create prejudice. A party cannot be deprived of the benefit of evidence which is relevant and material because it may also have a tendency to prejudice the adverse party in the eyes of the jury.[40]

Witness through whom evidence adduced. An objection to evidence merely because it is offered through the medium of a certain person, who is a competent witness, is not tenable.[41]

§ 187. Evidence Wrongfully Obtained

Evidence obtained fraudulently, wrongfully, or illegally ordinarily is not incompetent, unless it is rendered incompetent as a result of constitutional or statutory regulations.

The courts do not concern themselves with the method by which a party has secured the evidence which he adduces in support of his contentions,[42] and hence in the absence of constitutional or statutory restrictions evidence which is otherwise admissible will not be excluded because it has been obtained fraudulently, wrongfully, or illegally.[43] This

Contrary inferences as test
That contrary inference may be drawn from testimony is not alone a test of its competency.—Ferris v. McArdle, 106 A. 460, 92 N.J.Law 580.

Contradictions and discrepancies as affecting competency
(1) While contradictory statements unexplained may affect the credibility of a witness, they are not for that reason alone incompetent as evidence.—Heard v. Burton-Boyd Mercantile Co., 80 So. 40, 202 Ala. 218.

Competency in criminal prosecutions of evidence wrongfully obtained see Criminal Law § 657.

Act of third person
Where a bank carrying burglary and robbery insurance was robbed and certain funds taken, part of

rule is most frequently applied in the case of documentary evidence, as to which it has been held that papers which are in fact in court may be used in evidence notwithstanding that the party offering them obtained them illegally.[44] Another application is in the case of articles which are in the nature of exhibits.[45]

However, in some jurisdictions where officers of the government violate defendant's constitutional rights by obtaining evidence by means of an illegal search or seizure or by compulsion or duress, the evidence is inadmissible.[46]

§ 188. Telephone Conversations

Evidence of a telephone conversation is competent and admissible, provided the identity of the parties to the conversation is satisfactorily established.

Unless otherwise objectionable,[47] a telephone con-which were claimed to have been recovered by the sheriff from defendant, who was a friend of the person charged with the actual robbery, in an action by insurer against the robber, defendant, and the sheriff to recover possession of such money, evidence by the officers relative to the search of defendant's room and the recovery of the money found hidden there was admissible, even if it should be conceded that the entry and search of defendant's room was in violation of law, since such wrongful acts could not be charged to plaintiff.—Allison v. American Surety Co. of New York, Tex.Civ.App., 248 S.W. 829.

Election contest

Testimony of voters given in proceeding to inquire into validity of election is admissible in quo warranto trial against alderman, even if illegally procured.—State v. Thorson, 231 N.W. 155, 202 Wis. 31.

Permission of defendant

Where a bank carrying burglary and robbery insurance was robbed and certain funds taken, part of which were claimed to have been recovered by the sheriff from defendant, who was a friend of the person charged with the actual robbery, in an action by insurer against the robber, defendant, and the sheriff to recover possession of such money, evidence by the officers relative to search of defendant's room, and the recovery of the money found hidden there, is admissible, notwithstanding the officers had no search warrant, the room being entered and the search made by defendant's permission.—Allison v. American Surety Co. of New York, Tex.Civ.App., 248 S.W. 829.

Post mortem as unreasonable search and seizure

Post mortem examination is not unreasonable search and seizure, within contemplation of Constitution, as regards admissibility of evidence therefrom.—Streipe v. Hubbuch Bros. & Wellendorf, 25 S.W.2d 358, 233 Ky. 194.

Promise of immunity

Testimony given by witnesses under promise of immunity made in reliance on repealed statute could be considered against dentist seeking to vacate order suspending him from practicing dentistry.—Parker v. Board of Dental Examiners of State of California, 14 P.2d 67, 216 Cal. 285.

Rule at common law

Common law did not exclude evidence because illegally obtained.—Joong Sui Noon v. U. S., C.C.A.Mo., 76 F.2d 249—U. S. v. Lee Hee, C.C.A. N.Y., 60 F.2d 924, affirming, D.C., 53 F.2d 681.

Testimony of hired detectives

That a party's case is predicated on the testimony of hired detectives or investigators does not necessarily render such testimony inadmissible, but this rule does not apply when detectives or investigators are engaged, not for the purpose of obtaining evidence, but to create it by deliberate enticement and inducement to furnish a basis for an application to the court for relief.—Meisner v. Meisner, 29 N.Y.S.2d 342.

Wire tapping

(1) Evidence obtained by the police by tapping a telephone wire should not be excluded on the ground that the police in obtaining the information violated a criminal statute.—People v. McDonald, 165 N.Y.S. 41, 177 App.Div. 806.

(2) A surreptitious wire tapping, not involving a crime or coercion, does not render the evidence thus obtained inadmissible.—Young v. Young, 185 A. 901, 56 R.I. 401.

Violation of diplomatic rights

Correspondence is not inadmissible because obtained by order to produce, in violation of rights and privileges of counsel of foreign government.—Kunglig Jarnvagsstyrelsen v. Dexter & Carpenter, C.C.A.N.Y., 32 F.2d 195, certiorari denied 50 S.Ct. 32, 280 U.S. 579, 74 L.Ed. 629.

47. Or.—Johnston v. Fitzhugh, 178 P. 230, 91 Or. 247.

Grounds of inadmissibility

(1) Telephone conversation wherein maker of note was alleged to have told purchaser that maker had not received royalty assignment on oil and mineral lease to be given as consideration, and that unless it was delivered he would not take care of note, was inadmissible on issue of failure of consideration as irrelevant, immaterial, incompetent, and a self-serving declaration.—Thomasson v. Davis, Tex.Civ.App., 74 S.W.2d 557, error dismissed.

versation between a witness and another person is admissible in any case in which a face to face conversation between a witness and another person would be admissible in evidence,[48] provided that the identity of the person with whom the witness was speaking is satisfactorily established,[49] but not otherwise.[50]

Proof of identity is most readily afforded by the

(2) Inaccurate testimony of employee of steamship company as to telephone conversations, four years previously, was purely speculative and without testimonial value—The Frederick v. Luckenbach, D.C.N.Y., 15 F.2d 241.

(3) Admitting testimony of wife of plaintiff in libel action respecting certain communications over telephone constituted error, where she made no claim she informed plaintiff of conversations.—Williams v. Standard-Examiner Pub. Co., 27 P.2d 1, 83 Utah 31.

(4) On the question of a broker's authority, testimony of a witness, who heard the broker tell defendant's president over the telephone that he had made a purchase of German marks, and asked him to confirm it, was not admissible where there was no evidence of what defendant's president said in reply, which reply is determinative of the question of authority, and no other evidence of the conversation of which such testimony could be corroborative.—Gubelman v. Ands Koch, Inc., 138 N.E. 81, 234 N.Y. 425, reversing 192 N.Y.S. 928, 200 App.Div. 894.

(5) Where plaintiff seller relied on a telephone order from defendant buyer's president, and plaintiff's representative, who took the order, stated that she knew defendant's president personally, "having spoken to him on the telephone before," evidently her testimony as to the person from whom she received the order was worthless, in the absence of any other proof that defendant's president authorized the delivery, which was denied by him.—General Cheese Co. v. Contra Beeler v. Pacific Fruit & Produce Co., 233 P. 4, 133 Wash. 116.

Reason for rule

To hold one responsible for statements and answers made over the telephone by unidentified persons would open the door for fraud and imposition.—Cohen v. Standard Ac-witness' recognition of the voice of the person with whom he was speaking,[51] and, indeed, a number of cases seem to regard the witness' recognition or identification of the voice of the person with whom he spoke as essential to the admissibility of evidence of a telephone conversation.[52] The generally accepted view, however, is that the identity of the speaker may be established by means other than the recognition of his voice.[53]

The rule requiring the identity of the speaker to be established is subject to a well recognized exception to the effect that, where the witness called the listed telephone number of a party, such as his business office, testimony as to a conversation had with a person answering the telephone and purporting to be the person called is competent, although the witness did not recognize the voice of the person who spoke and is unable to identify the speaker,[54]

Subsequent recognition

The testimony of a witness as to his conversation over the telephone with a man whose voice he did not then recognize, but did subsequently recognize, as the voice of defendant, is not incompetent, although it may well be thought by the jury to be weak evidence.—People v. Evidence held to show identity

(1) In action on indemnity bond for loss of liberty bonds taken surreptitiously by buyer, who left forged check, testimony of plaintiffs' clerk as to telephone conversation with ostensible payee is sufficiently connected by payee's testimony as to questions of age, appearance, and a previous call made to be admissible for purpose of showing that plaintiffs did not rely on the check.—Kahn v. Maryland Casualty Co., 218 P. 452, 63 Cal.App. 180.

(2) Testimony of telephone conversation between witness and plaintiff's bookkeeper was erroneously excluded under evidence identifying person calling witness as plaintiff's bookkeeper.—International Harvester Co. of America v. Caldwell, 153 S.E. 325, 198 N.C. 751.

Evidence held not to show identity

(1) Witness' statement that person with whom he carried on a telephone conversation stated he was a plaintiff is not sufficient identity to render testimony as to conversation admissible.—Hirsch v. Sherman, 205 N.Y.S. 434, 123 Misc. 419.

(2) Testimony of alleged telephone conversation with buyer was inadmissible for want of identification, where seller had never called buyer before, and buyer's address, telephone number, and business connection were unknown to seller and telephone operator, who was not called.—Wyckoff v. Jarrell, 170 A. 802, 5 W.W.Harr., Del., 542.

(3) In action by purchaser of note against maker, maker's testimony of telephone conversation wherein party calling asked him about signing, and only related that he was buying some stuff with payee, and maker could not recognize voice as that of purchaser, and no other fact was related by which his identity could be established, and there was no evidence that purchaser was then buying any property with payee, is inadmissible to show purchaser's notice of lack of consideration, as not sufficiently identifying person talking as purchaser.—Thomasson v. Davis, Tex.Civ.App., 74 S.W.2d 557, error dismissed.

(4) Other cases see Miller v. Kelly, 183 N.W. 717, 215 Mich. 254.

Subject matter and time of telephone conversation, and parties' conduct, establishing identity of person with whom conversation occurred, may be sufficient to make it admissible.—Merchants' Nat. Bank of St. Paul v. State Bank of Worthington, 214 N.W. 750, 172 Minn. 24.

provided the conversation is such as might properly be made to a person answering the call.[55] This exception is recognized for the reason that one who answers a telephone call from the place of business of the person called for, is presumed to be the person called,[56] but such proof of identity is merely prima facie and is subject to rebuttal.[57] Conversely, it has been held that a witness who is called on the telephone may testify as to who the speaker stated he was and what he said, although the speaker was unknown to the witness.[58]

Testimony of bystander. The admissibility of testimony of a bystander as to one side of a telephone conversation is governed by the rule relating to the admissibility of oral conversations,[59] so that one who overheard a telephone conversation should be permitted to testify thereto,[60] particularly when such testimony is corroborative of other testimony,[61] provided, but not unless, he is able to identify positively the speaker whose statements he undertakes to repeat.[62] Such testimony may relate to that portion of the conversation by the party in the bystander's presence or that heard from the party at the other end of the line.[63]

However, this rule is confined to evidence of the portion of conversation overheard, and evidence that the conversation was with a certain third person or that someone brought up a certain topic is inadmissible,[64] although it has been held that even if the person testifying did not hear the conversation, but was told of it by a participant, such testimony is competent.[65]

Testimony of conversations received by other mechanical means. The rules governing the admissibility of testimony of telephone conversations have been extended to include testimony of conversations received by other mechanical means.[66] Thus, testimony of a conversation from another room, received through an electrical apparatus transmitting the voices through ear phones, is competent, provided the identity of the speaker is established.[67]

Mode of establishing identity

(1) The identity of the other party to a telephone conversation, part of which was overheard by a bystander, may be established by direct or circumstantial evidence.—Atlantic Coast Realty Co. v. Robertson's Ex'r, 116 S.E. 476, 135 Va. 247.

(2) Where a witness heard but one side of a telephone conversation and knew only by inference with whom it was being held, he may testify as to the conversation, where the identity of the other party to the conversation is established by other evidence —Miles v. Andrews, 38 N.E. 644, 153 Ill. 262.

Identification held sufficient

(1) Evidence by witness that she heard plaintiff calling defendant by name over the telephone and listened to part of the conversation between them, and by plaintiff that she called defendant and talked with her and that during the conversation witness listened part of the time, is sufficient identification of the other party to the conversation to render it admissible.—Greenberg v. Greenberg, 133 N.E. 18, 79 Ind.App. 218, rehearing denied 134 N.E. 311, 79 Ind. App. 218.

(2) Testimony that defendant's testator had on two separate evenings called by telephone for plaintiff's agent at a hotel without finding him in, and that on the third evening he put in a call, addressed the agent by name, and stated he had tried to get him previously, with admissions by the agent that he was at the hotel and had a telephone conversation on one occasion and one only with testator, is sufficient to identify the agent as the other party to the telephone conversation, so as to render the conversation admissible, although the agent fixed the date as a different date and gave contrary testimony as to the substance of the conversation.—Atlantic Coast Realty Co. v. Robertson's Ex'r, 116 S.E. 476, 135 Va. 247.

(3) In mortgagor's action for interfering with possession of realty through use of excessive force by officers acting under void writ of assistance and as agents of mortgagee bank, which purchased on foreclosure, and of bank's grantees, witness' testimony that she was familiar with voices of bank president and grantees' attorney, and that she heard attorney ask over telephone if another party was president and receive affirmative answer, was sufficient foundation for admission of testimony that president instructed attorney to eject mortgagor "dead or alive."—Bingham v. § 190. Evidence Admissible by Reason of Admission of Similar Evidence of Adverse Party

a. In general
b. Nature of evidence

a. In General

Evidence otherwise inadmissible is frequently admitted because of the fact that similar evidence has been introduced by the adverse party, and accordingly the introduction by one party of part of a conversation, writing, or transaction may, within the discretion of the court, entitle the adverse party to introduce the whole thereof.

As stated in Corpus Juris, which statement has been quoted and cited by the courts, it frequently happens that evidence which might be inadmissible under strict rules is nevertheless introduced into the case through inadvertence or otherwise, under which circumstances it is held, sometimes as a result of statutory regulation, that the adverse party is entitled to introduce evidence on the same matters lest he be prejudiced.[69] The party who first intro-

Action for death

(1) In a statutory action for death in automobile accident, evidence that defendant was proceeding at exces-

duces improper evidence cannot object to the admission of evidence from the adverse party relating to the same matter.[70]

However, the admission of such evidence is not a matter of absolute right,[71] but rests in the sound discretion of the court,[72] which will not permit a party to introduce evidence, which should not be admitted, merely because the adverse party has brought out some evidence on the same subject, where the circumstances are such that no prejudice can result from a refusal to go into the matter further.[73]

Evidence of whole of conversation, writing, or transaction. Under the rules discussed supra this section, where part of a conversation,[74] declarasive rate of speed when he passed witness' car a mile and a half or two miles from place of accident is admissible, where there is other evidence showing that defendant at least maintained as high a rate of speed over intervening distance.—Hinton v. Carmody, 45 P.2d 32, 182 Wash. 123.

(2) In action against township for death of minor occupants resulting from injuries received when truck left brick highway and overturned, indictment charging truck driver with involuntary manslaughter to which driver had pleaded guilty is admissible to contradict driver's testimony for plaintiffs, to effect that he had not pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter, even though such testimony concerned immaterial collateral issue.—Helmick v. Township of South Union, 185 A. 609, 323 Pa. 433.

Collateral facts

Evidence of collateral facts may be met by evidence of another such fact, tending to weaken or overcome impression made on jury's mind by former evidence.

Motive

(1) In action on life policy, wherein insurer, which was relying on defense that insured committed suicide, introduced evidence that insured was short in his accounts, so as to establish a motive for suicide, court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff to introduce evidence tending to prove that the claim of shortage was without foundation.—Scott v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 282 N.W. 467, 203 Minn. 547.

(2) Likewise, the court should have received plaintiff's offer to show that no claim for any shortage was ever made against insured or against his estate.—Scott v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, supra.

Remote incidents

Testimony of remote incidents happening years back in a testator's life and bearing on his testamentary capacity were not improperly admitted where proponents themselves had opened the field by the examination of their witnesses.—Catt v. Robins, 137 N.E. 101, 305 Ill. 76.

Value

When insured in action for fire loss was permitted, over insurer's objection, to introduce evidence as to reasonable market value of household goods and personal property destroyed by fire, denying insurer right to introduce evidence as to value of similar property was error.—Maasdam v. Jefferson County Farmers' Mut. Ins. Ass'n, 268 N.W. 491, 222 Iowa 162.

Epithets

In an action on a note, where plaintiff testified on both direct and redirect examination of the bad feeling existing between him and defendant without objection, testimony of the use of vile epithets by plaintiff to defendant was admissible.—Booth v. Crosby, Tex.Civ.App., 248 S.W. 417.

Evidence as foundation for impeachment

The rule that, where a party opens the door by introducing a part of a conversation, the opposing party has a right to all that was said therein, is without application, where the opening party confines his examination to purpose of laying a foundation for impeachment.—Spickelmeir v. Hartman, 123 N.E. 232, 72 Ind. App. 207.

Evidence merely that conversation occurred does not give the party adverse to the one introducing such evidence the right to show what was said in such conversation.—Jones v. Central of Georgia Ry. Indorsement, memorandum, or entry
(1) An indorsement, memorandum, or entry on a document or the back thereof may be shown by a party whose adversary has introduced the document, coming from his own possession, in evidence —Stucker v. Shumaker, 139 A. 114, 290 Pa. 348—22 C. J. p 196 note 7 [d].

(2) However, maker's self-serving indorsement on back of agreement, pursuant to which note sued on was alleged to have been made, is not part of agreement so as to compel its reception.—Stucker v. Shumaker, supra

Reception by stipulation
If document not strictly admissible is received by stipulation, general rule that entire document should be admitted is applicable.—Sullivan v. Morse, 171 N.E. 668, 271 Mass. 501.

Record of proceedings
(1) Where defendant, in administratrix's action for death of deceased, pleaded settlement with foreign administratrix, and only introduced record of her appointment, entire record of such proceedings was admissible.—Willgues v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 298 S.W. 817, 318 Mo. 28.

(2) However, a part of record which is not competent evidence to explain the record previously admitted is inadmissible.—Belfore v. Vermont State Highway Department, 187 A 797, 108 Vt. 396

Reference to instrument
(1) The fact that a written instrument, no part of which was included in evidence, was referred to on cross-examination, does not render it admissible when offered in evidence by the opposite party.—San Bois Coal Co. v. Resetz, 143 P. 46, 43 Okl. 384.

(2) Reference in one document to another must be such as to incorporate it for both to be admissible as part of same transaction.—Stucker v. Shumaker, 139 A. 114, 290 Pa. 348.

(3) Where corporate balance sheets have been received in evidence, sheets of comments to which the balance sheets refer are admissible on behalf of the adverse party.—Pridmore v. Whiting Corporation, 268 Ill. App. 592.

(2) In some jurisdictions this is a statutory rule —American Oil Pump & Tank Co. v. Foust, 274 P. 322, 128 Or. 263.

(3) The rule applies even when the reply is to a different letter when it in fact answers the contentions advanced in the letter in evidence.—Warfield v. Wire Wheel Corporation of America, supra.

(4) However, the reply must not be irrelevant or immaterial.—American Oil Pump & Tank Co. v. Foust, supra.

(5) Portions of the reply which are self-serving and merely argumentative should be excluded.—Ja-action[81] is shown in evidence by one party, the other party, may for purposes of explanation,[82] show the remainder, or so much thereof as is necessary to a complete understanding of the part already shown.[83] As pointed out in Depositions § 91 a, the same principle applies where part of a deposition is introduced in evidence.

Evidence corroborative of first improper evidence. After the improper admission of evidence and the allowance of rebutting evidence, further proof to corroborate the evidence first admitted is not permitted.[84]

b. Nature of Evidence

The improper nature of the evidence does not prevent the application of the rules that where one party has introduced evidence ordinarily inadmissible, or a part thereof, the adverse party is entitled to introduce similar evidence or the whole thereof.

Where objection is made, the admission of illegal evidence on the part of one of the parties will not authorize his adversary to introduce similar illegal evidence in rebuttal.—Smith v. Burroughs, Tex.Civ.App., not only to the subject matter of evidence, but also to its nature.[86] It is considered that one party should be allowed to introduce evidence not in its nature such as should be received where similar evidence has been received from the other party without objection, as in the case of secondary evidence,[87] hearsay evidence,[88] declarations of a deceased person,[89] self-serving declarations,[90] declarations against interest,[91] parol evidence affecting writings,[92] opinion evidence,[93] or conclusions of a witness.[94]

§ 191. Evidence Inadmissible by Reason of Exclusion of Similar Evidence of Adverse Party

Where evidence of one party as to a particular matter is excluded, the adverse party may not introduce evidence as to the same matter, but dissimilar evidence is not thereby made inadmissible.

Where evidence of a particular matter offered by one party has been excluded, although perhaps improperly, on the objection of the adverse party, the adverse party is not entitled to introduce evidence with respect to the same matter.[96] An irresponsive answer which was stricken out as such does not en-

Document admissible only for certain purposes

Where counsel has conceded of record that a document is admissible only for certain purposes, such document, when attempted to be introduced for other purposes, is inadmissible, particularly when its admission would raise an inference unfavorable to the adverse party pred-

title the other party to introduce like evidence.[97]

On the other hand, the fact that a party has succeeded in preventing the admission of certain evidence does not render dissimilar evidence inadmissible.[98] Thus, the exclusion of a question as to what the bargain was in regard to goods sold under written contract does not preclude the admission of testimony as to representations made at and before the signing of the contract.[99]

VII. UNSWORN STATEMENTS

A. HEARSAY

§ 192. Definition

Evidence is hearsay when its probative force depends on the competency and credibility of some person other than the witness.

Evidence is called hearsay when its probative force depends, in whole or in part, on the competency and credibility of some person other than the witness by whom it is sought to produce it.[1]

§ 193. Rule Excluding Hearsay

Subject to certain exceptions, the courts will not receive testimony of a witness as to what some other person told him, as evidence of the existence of the fact asserted.

The courts will not receive the testimony of a witness as to what some other person told him, as evidence of the existence of the fact asserted.[2] The

such person can be summoned and sworn as a witness.[7]

A hearsay statement will be rejected, although it was embodied in a question to the witness[8] or made part of his answer,[9] although it took the form of an expression of opinion,[10] or although it was made by[11] or to[12] a physician.

The objection that evidence is hearsay is frequently raised under circumstances not calling for an application of the hearsay rule, and the reports are full of cases in which the courts have refused to sustain such an objection.[13] Furthermore, ex-

Examination for purposes of litigation

Although for certain purposes an exception to hearsay rule had been recognized in favor of physician's testimony repeating statements made by patient in the course of treatment, concerning the history of his ailment, such testimony is not admissible when patient caused himself to be examined for the purpose of physician's giving evidence in a case about to be tried—Mitchell v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 285 N.W. 187, 226 Iowa 956.

Admissibility of independently relevant statements see infra §§ 239–259.

Conversation through interpreter

(1) An interpreter, who is selected by two persons speaking different languages as a medium of communication with each other, is regarded as a joint agent for that purpose, and the statements of the interpreter as to what they say in the presence of each other are regarded as the statements of the persons themselves, and are admissible as original evidence, and are not hearsay.—Boicelli v. Giannini, 224 P. 777, 65 Cal.App. 601—22 C.J. p 205 note 43 [d].

(2) In a proceeding to disbar counsel for misconduct, testimony by clients as to statements made by the attorney through an interpreter, was admissible.—In re Coburn, 174 N.W. 134, 207 Mich. 350.

(3) However, in death action against railroad, deceased's widow was not competent to testify as to conversation with engineer through an interpreter, where interpreter acted solely for widow.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Giun, 116 S.W.2d 693, 131 Tex. 548, 116 A.L.R. 795, reversing Giun v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co., Civ.App., 89 S.W.2d 465.

Corroborative evidence

In action for unpaid portion of salary, testimony of mutual friend, about conversation with defendant concerning reduction of plaintiff's salary, being corroborative evidence, was held not inadmissible as hearsay.—Lucas v. Morefield, 137 So. 633, 18 La.App. 497.

Oral directions to agent are not hearsay, but substantive evidence to prove agent's authority or lack of authority.—Powerine Co. v. Grimm Stamp & Badge Co., 254 N.W. 722, 127 Neb. 165.

Statement of right of possession

Possessor may state by what right he occupied land claimed by adverse possession without thereby violating hearsay rule—Federal Crude Oil Co. v. Yount-Lee Oil Co., Tex.Civ.App., 73 S.W.2d 969, error dismissed and certiorari denied 55 S Ct. 655, 295 U. S. 741, 79 L.Ed. 1687.

Relaxation of rule

The hearsay rule, as basis for rejecting extrajudicial testimony or statements, is often relaxed, especially in the case of such statements by a party or his agent where opportunity for confrontation and cross-examination has been afforded and exercised.—Chicago, St P., M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Kulp, C C.A Minn., 102 F.2d 352, certiorari denied 59 S.Ct. 1032, 307 U.S. 636, 83 L.Ed. 1518.

Refusal to make statement

In determining whether money was taken by assignor in bank robbery, jury could consider hearsay testimony that assignor refused to make statement regarding money.—McKinley v. Smith, 17 P.2d 1032, 128 Cal.App. 591.

15. Ga.—Rea v. Pursley, 154 S.E. 325, 170 Ga. 788.

Statutory exceptions as exclusive

Statutory exceptions are not exhaustive of the cases in which hearsay is admissible.—Rea v. Pursley, supra.

the C.J.S. title Witnesses § 628, also 70 C.J. p 1153 note 66, declarations of a witness out of court inconsistent with his testimony are not admissible to prove the truth of the facts stated, but only for purposes of impeachment.

Negative hearsay. A negative form of hearsay has been recognized in refusing to admit evidence that a certain person had not mentioned a certain fact to the witness.[31]

Oral admissions. An oral admission of a party can be shown only by the testimony of a person who heard it; a witness who did not hear the admission cannot testify as to what a person who did hear it told him about it.[32]

Acts as hearsay. An act may amount to an expression of feeling so as to come within the rule against hearsay.[33] Further, the courts have excluded, as hearsay, evidence that another's landlord had levied a distress warrant on property allegedly belonging to plaintiff,[34] evidence of the revocation of an automobile driver's license,[35] and evidence of the practice of a contractor's agent with respect to requests for materials.[36]

On the other hand, proof of the conduct of the parties is not objectionable as hearsay,[37] and verbal acts do not fall within the hearsay rule.[38]

Hearsay in connection with other evidence. In connection with other evidence which is competent in itself, evidence which, standing alone, would be objectionable as hearsay, may sometimes be received.[39]

Hearsay before administrative tribunal. Before an administrative tribunal, hearsay has been held to be admissible.[40]

§ 194. Written or Printed Hearsay

Statements otherwise objectionable as hearsay are not rendered admissible because they have been reduced to writing, as where the form is judicial, official, mercantile, or more fugitive, or because they are printed, as where they appear in the form of a book or treatise on a scientific subject.

A statement otherwise objectionable as hearsay does not become competent because it has been reduced to writing.[41] A written statement is equally inadmissible under the rule excluding hearsay evi-

(1) Stenographer's transcript of the proceedings of a trial is not evidence of the purported facts appearing therein.—City of Newark v. Cook, 133 A. 875, 99 N.J.Eq. 527, affirmed 135 A. 915, 100 N.J.Eq. 581 and 135 A. 916 (two cases), 100 N.J.Eq. 582, certiorari denied McEuen v. City of Newark, 47 S.Ct. 768, 274 U.S. 757, 71 L.Ed. 1337.

(2) The stenographer's transcript of witness' testimony at former hearing is mere hearsay, and so testimony by the presiding judge that the transcript was correct is inadmissible, being merely double hearsay.—Woods v. Postal Telegraph Cable Co., 87 So. 681, 205 Ala. 236, 27 A.L.R. 834.

Failure to establish report as exception to hearsay rule

In action for total and permanent disability benefits under war risk policy on ground of alleged mental incapacity, mere fact of presence of report with reference to insured in veterans' administration file did not render report admissible, in absence of establishing report as within class of official records which are excepted from hearsay rule.—U. S. v. Smart, C.C.A.Ala., 87 F.2d 1.

printed,[90] although it appears in the responsible form of a book,[91] and although such book is a treatise by an author of standard authority on a scientific subject,[92] such as a medical treatise.[93]

However, certain printed statements have been admitted as against the objection that they constitute hearsay evidence.[94] A statement in a standard treatise is competent where the relevant fact is the existence of the statement itself,[95] and it has been held that a statement by the compiler in the preface to a dictionary published in 1850 that he had adopted Webster's Dictionary as the basis for his own is admissible.[96]

§ 195. Composite Hearsay

Matters constituting composite hearsay are discussed infra §§ 196–199.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 196. Reputation as to Matters of General Interest

Evidence of reputation as to matters of general interest is admissible.

Although it has been suggested that reputation is not a form of hearsay but a fact in itself circumstantially relevant,[97] nevertheless it consists of the general statements of members of the community with relation to a particular fact, and hence may be regarded as a species of composite hearsay.[98]

Reputation has a higher probative value than the mere unsworn statements of a single person or of a few persons, and indeed statements on a matter of general interest, which have been so uniform, reiterated, and dominant as to create a general reputation throughout the community,[99] at a time when it was fairly distinterested,[1] may well give rise to an inference that the fact is as asserted,[2] and such reputation is accordingly received in evidence when original and primary evidence to the same effect is not obtainable,[3] or even in corroboration of a witness who states the fact positively.[4] The reputation which is admissible, however, must refer to a public or general right and not to a particular exercise of it.[5]

Particular subject matter. Among subjects in which the community is interested, and concerning which reputation has been held admissible, are its general rights or liabilities as a whole with respect to beaches,[6] bridges, ferries, highways, profits a prendre, and free warrens;[7] the existence of general customs[8] or rights of common;[9] the fact of municipal incorporation;[10] and, as shown in Boundaries § 106, the location of public and private boundaries.

Evidence as to common reputation of ownership is admissible where claims to public lands and to water on such lands are involved,[11] but the reputation must be that of a past generation.[12] As the performance of certain public or quasi public services is a matter of importance to the community, the fact that a designated person discharges the duties of an office or occupation of general concern,[13] or of popular interest,[14] may be shown by reputation.

Facts of genealogy stand in a peculiar position as a matter of quasi public concern, and, where the race to which a person belongs is in issue, proof of general reputation is competent.[15] Parentage may be proved by general reputation.[16]

§ 197. Reputation as to Matters of Special or Limited Interest

Evidence of reputation cannot ordinarily be received where the fact involved is of only special or limited interest.

Where the fact involved is of only special or limited interest, evidence of reputation cannot be received.[17] Among the facts which are within this rule are the habits or idiosyncrasies of individual members of the community in business or social life;[18] their position in the community;[19] and their financial,[20] mental,[21] or physical[22] condition. Water rights
Where evidence as to ancient common reputation as to the ownership of water rights was admissible, the most that could be shown by a witness was that there was an ancient common reputation in the community relative to the diversion and use of water for some beneficial purpose, stating what that reputation was, and to ask the witness to state who was reputed to be the owner of "springs" could only mislead, since there can only be ownership of a right to take and use water, and not of the corpus of the water.—Simons v. er facts included within the rule are facts of personal history,[23] even where, as in case of the ownership[24] or possession[25] of property, real[26] or personal,[27] or a modus concerning it,[28] the matter is one in which the community has a degree of interest; or the relation, as of agency[29] or partnership,[30] in which members of the community stand to each other; and residence in a particular place or community.[31]

In addition, general reputation cannot establish the existence of moral qualities,[32] such as chastity[33] or loyalty,[34] except where proof of character is permitted in case of a party, see infra §§ 423–436, or a witness see the C.J.S. title Witnesses §§ 491–536, also 70 C.J. p 820 note 22–p 934 note 77.

However, it has been held that evidence of reputation is admissible to prove that a certain name has been used to designate a particular individual,[35] or to prove the designation of a house[36] or other place.[37] Further, evidence of reputation of ownership of property has been admitted as a circumstance showing an assertion of ownership under a deed,[38] to show the character of an asserted claim,[39] to show notice or notoriety of claim of title,[40] to show presumption of deed and acquiescence of the apparent owner;[41] and such evidence is properly admitted under a statute providing that ownership may be presumed from common reputation.[42] Likewise, general reputation as to the character of the possession of land is admissible if confined to the period before the existence of any dispute.[43]

§ 198. Rumors

Rumor is not evidence to prove a particular fact, although the existence of a rumor may be independently relevant.

Rumor is as much inferior in probative quality to hearsay as reputation is above it; consequently, as a rule rumor is not relevant evidence to prove a particular fact.[44]

However, the existence of a rumor may be independently relevant.[45]

§ 199. Tradition

Tradition is not deemed sufficiently probative to warrant an inference of the truth of the fact asserted except where it relates to matters of public or general interest.

Although tradition has a probative value superior to rumor, it is not deemed sufficiently probative to warrant an inference of the truth of the fact asserted,[46] except where it relates to matters of pub-

§ 200. Knowledge Acquired from Statements of Others

A witness cannot testify to facts as to which his knowledge is derived from unsworn statements of others; but knowledge acquired in the line of official duty or employment is not objectionable as based on hearsay.

From the rule stated supra § 193 that a witness cannot testify as to what he heard other persons say, it follows naturally that he will not be permitted to testify to facts where his knowledge thereof is derived from the unsworn statements of others,[50] or even where his knowledge is partly based on such statements,[51] and the rule in this respect is the same, although the foundation of the witness' knowledge is hearsay in the composite form of reputation in the community,[52] or in the form of a written or even an official statement.[53] The rule applies to proof of the contents of a lost document,[54] and has been applied to evidence of the value of property.[55]

However, it is considered that knowledge acquired in the line of official duty or employment is not objectionable as based on hearsay.[56]

§ 201. Acts Based on Hearsay

Evidence of every material act of a witness having its sole origin in hearsay statements made to him should be rejected.

Where conversations are properly excluded because they are hearsay, evidence of every material act done by the witness which had its sole origin in the hearsay statements made to him, should also be rejected.[57]

§ 202. Proof as to Character of Evidence

Generally the testimony of a witness is received where he may have personal knowledge and it does not affirmatively appear that he speaks from hearsay, subject to be stricken if it subsequently appears to be hearsay.

While it has been asserted that the testimony of a witness should not be received unless it first appears that he is prepared to testify from his own knowledge,[58] the more generally accepted view is that, where the matter in controversy is such that the witness may have personal knowledge and it does not affirmatively appear that he speaks from hearsay, his testimony should be received,[59] subject to be stricken if it subsequently appears to be objectionable under the hearsay rule.[60]

The hearsay quality of the witness' knowledge may sufficiently appear from his own statement,[61] as where it is sought to prove the contents of a lost instrument by a witness who cannot read or write,[62] or where a witness attempts to state what he "found out,"[63] or "understood,"[64] or "heard."[65] Where a witness testified as to certain facts and then added that he was too young to remember that now, his explanation rendered his testimony hearsay.[66]

§ 203. Hearsay Additional to Personal Knowledge

Testimony as to a fact which the witness knows personally is not inadmissible because he also knows it from hearsay.

Testimony as to a fact of which the witness swears he has personal knowledge is not rendered inadmissible by a further showing that he also knows it from hearsay.[67]

§ 204. Impossibility of Obtaining Other Evidence

Hearsay evidence is sometimes admitted where more satisfactory evidence of the facts asserted by declarant is not available and the facts cannot be proved in any other way than by his declaration.

While it has been said generally that the rule excluding hearsay applies with full force, although no better evidence is to be found,[68] there is a considerable tendency to apply, under such circumstances, an analogy to the rule, stated infra §§ 822–834, which admits secondary evidence when the best or primary evidence is lost, destroyed, or inaccessible, and to receive hearsay evidence where it is made apparent that more satisfactory evidence of the facts asserted by the declarant is not available.[69] Such a situation arises where the declarant is dead,[70] out of the jurisdiction,[71] or physically unable to testify in court or by deposition,[72] or when, for any reason satisfactory to the court, he cannot be found or cannot be produced in court,[73] and the situation presents the further element of impossibility of proving the fact in any other way than by his declaration.[74]

Facts in pais, which occurred at a time fairly beyond the ordinary period of personal memory,[75] and of which no written evidence can be presumed to exist, may be established by direct hearsay evidence.[76]

§ 205. Death of Declarant

Unless otherwise provided by statute, declarations objectionable as hearsay are not rendered competent by reason of the death of declarant.

The rule, in the absence of statute providing otherwise, is that declarations which are objectionable as hearsay are not rendered competent by the fact that the declarant has died since such declarations were made.[77] It has been recognized, however, that

"Necessity"

"Necessity," one of the bases underlying all exceptions to the hearsay rule, is not necessarily predicated on the fact that there is no other evidence available from any source to prove the point in question, but rather that a "necessity" exists because the particular information is not obtainable in a more authentic form from the same source.—In re Roeder's Estate, 103 P.2d 631, 44 N.M. 429.

Information obtained through broker

Testimony of witness as to samples of goods not being approved was held not objectionable because he stated he knew it only through his broker, it being impracticable to get the information in any other way, and witness having previously testified that the goods were sold subject to approval, and that the samples were to be sent to a broker.—Lockerman v. Want of good faith

The declarations are not admissible where they were not made in good faith.—Bodfish v. Cross, 126 N. E. 655, 235 Mass. 428.

Lack of personal knowledge

The declarations are inadmissible where they were not made on the personal knowledge of declarant.—Maloof v. Post Pub. Co., 28 N.E.2d 458, 306 Mass. 279—Dorchester Trust

Statutes of this character are to be liberally construed[81] to extend rather than to restrict the intended relief and to effectuate their corrective purpose.[82] They apply to written as well as to oral declarations,[83] and render evidence of such declarations competent, whenever the testimony of the decedent to the same effect would have been admissible.[84] However, such statutes do not apply to proceedings involving the proof of a will.[85] They have no application to any rule of exclusion except that of hearsay, and if on any other ground the evidence offered is objectionable such statutes do not render it admissible.[86] Whether a particular statement is admissible under such statutes is a preliminary question for the court to decide.[87] The fact that deceased's deposition might have been, but was not, taken does not affect the admissibility of statements of decedent.[88]

In some jurisdictions the statute authorizes the admission of evidence of declarations of a decedent relative to the matters in issue in actions by, or against, the personal representative of the deceased declarant.[89] Such a statute applies to written declarations[90] and permits in evidence declarations made by the decedent after the bringing of an action against him, the action being continued against his personal representative.[91] If the jury believes evidence of what decedent said, the situation is the same as though he had so testified in court.[92]

§ 206. Unavailability or Incompetency of Declarant

That declarant is unavailable or incompetent as a witness does not justify the admission of hearsay evidence.

Hearsay evidence does not become admissible by reason of the fact that the declarant is unavailable as a witness,[93] as where he has left the state[94] or

Co. v. Casey, 176 N.E. 178, 268 Mass. 494, 71 A.L.R. 1—Hicks v. H. B. Church Truck Service Co., 156 N.E. 254, 259 Mass 272—Dow v. Dow, 137 N.E. 746, 243 Mass. 587—Crowley v. O'Donnell, 131 N.E. 70, 238 Mass. 475.

What constitutes personal knowledge

Personal knowledge of declarant, to entitle declarations of deceased to admission in evidence, must be derived from exercise of declarant's own senses.—Tenney v. Foss, 167 N. E. 280, 268 Mass. 69.

Opinion

(1) If statement was merely assertion of opinion, as distinguished from one of fact, it was not admissible.—Eldredge v. Barton, 122 N.E. 272, 232 Mass. 183—22 C.J. p 217 note 72 [a] (1), (2).

(2) However, where statement sought to be introduced as declaration of decedent involves more or less opinion, if it is, in substance, an inference of fact from a set of facts observed by him, which could not be described in detail, statement is admissible.—Eldredge v. Barton, 122 N. E. 272, 232 Mass. 183.

81. Mass.—Tenney v. Foss, 167 N.E. 280, 268 Mass. 69—Barney v. Magenis, 135 N.E. 142, 241 Mass. 268.

Statement reduced to writing

Fact that a statement was made by a party plaintiff and reduced to writing and signed by decedent ten or twelve years before the trial did not render it incompetent.—Quimby v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., 142 N.E. 925, 248 Mass. 364.

22 C.J. p 217 note 75.

Burden of satisfying conditions for the admission of such evidence rested on party offering it.—Cummings v. Moore, 25 N.E.2d 221, 305 Mass. 105—Kelley v. Jordan Marsh Co., 179 N.E. 299, 278 Mass. 101—McCabe v. City of Chelsea, 163 N.E. 255, 265 Mass. 494.

Finding inferred from admission

Finding of deceased declarant's good faith, making declaration admissible, will be inferred from admission, where exceptions failed to state inquiry was not made.—Tenney v. Foss, 167 N.E. 280, 268 Mass. 69—Horan v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co., 129 N.E. 355, 237 Mass. 245—22 C.J. p 217 note 75 [c].

Admission of hospital record of deceased on issue whether facts authorizing admission of deceased's declarations existed did not require giving probative force to hospital record upon issue of liability.—Kelley v. Jordan Marsh Co., 179 N.E. 299, 278 Mass. 101.

Discretion of court

The trial court should have considerable discretion in applying the statute.—Walsh v. Morgan, 198 A. 555, 60 R.I. 349.

country,[95] or is sick,[96] or cannot be examined[97] or compelled to testify.[98]

The incompetency of declarant as a witness does not permit the introduction of hearsay evidence.[99]

§ 207. Verification of Statements

Testimony by a witness that he has truly stated to a third person, from his own knowledge, a fact which he has since forgotten renders competent testimony of such third person as to what the statement was; and a like rule applies to evidence translated by an interpreter.

Where a witness testifies that he has truly stated to a third person, from his own knowledge, a fact which he has since forgotten, he thereby renders competent the testimony of that person as to what the forgotten statement actually was.[1]

The course is the same in other cases where the testimony of two witnesses is necessary to a complete statement; thus, where an interpreter swears that he truly translated certain evidence to a court stenographer, the stenographer may then swear that he has truly reproduced the statements made to him by the interpreter, and such minutes may be read to refresh the stenographer's recollection.[2]

§ 208. Statement of Results

Notwithstanding the hearsay rule, a witness may state what certain unsworn statements show and, assuming them to be correct, what they prove.

The hearsay rule does not necessarily preclude a witness from stating what certain unsworn statements show and, assuming them to be correct, what they prove;[3] nor is such rule violated by allowing a witness to state the results of voluminous facts, or of an inspection of books and papers which cannot conveniently take place in court.[4]

§ 209. Remote or Collateral Facts

Remote or collateral facts may be proved by hearsay.

Hearsay is sometimes received as proof of remote or collateral facts.[5]

§ 210. Matters to Be Decided by Judge

The hearsay rule is considerably relaxed where the evidence is addressed solely to the judge.

A strong reason for the exclusion of hearsay is found in the distrust of the ability of a jury to give the proper weight to an unsworn statement, as only a well trained mind can give such a statement any weight without grave danger of giving it undue weight.[6] This reason is not present where the evidence is addressed solely to the judge, to enable him to decide matters of fact, or to determine as to the exercise of discretion, and consequently the rule is considerably relaxed under such circumstances.[7]

B. DECLARATIONS

§ 211. In General

A declaration is an unsworn statement or narration of facts made by a party to the transaction or by one who has an interest in the existence of the facts recounted.

A declaration is a species of hearsay, which has been defined as an unsworn statement or narration of facts made by a party to the transaction, or by one who has an interest in the existence of the facts recounted.[8] The rules pertaining to the admissibility of declarations relate to unsworn statements or declarations extrajudicial in nature, and not to statements made in court.[9]

Frequently declarations, while objectionable as hearsay, in a broad sense, are subject to another objection, of itself sufficient for their rejection, lying in the fact that they are irrelevant, see infra § 212, or, as is shown infra §§ 213–216, they lack probative value because of the untrustworthiness of the declarant.

§ 212. Irrelevant Declarations

A declaration is rejected as irrelevant where it has no bearing on the existence of any disputed fact, or where it is not sufficiently connected with the party so as to affect him.

A declaration is rejected as irrelevant where it appears that it can have no bearing on the existence of any disputed fact,[10] at least in the absence of additional facts which are not furnished.[11] Likewise a statement or declaration is inadmissible where it is not sufficiently connected with the party so as to affect him and thereby become relevant,[12] as where a statement is not shown to have been made in his presence,[13] or to have been heard by him or brought to his notice.[14]

Agency not apparent. An unsworn statement may be irrelevant because made by a third person whose agency for the party,[15] as by reason of the relationship of father,[16] mother,[17] husband,[18] wife,[19] son,[20] daughter,[21] or grandchild,[22] or because the declarant is acting as an employee[23] has not been satisfactorily established. The same is true where it is not satisfactorily established that the declarant occupied the relation of agent as interpreter.[24]

Privity not apparent. The statements of one not satisfactorily shown to have been in privity with a party are irrelevant when offered against him as declarations of a privy.[25]

§ 213. Untrustworthiness of Declarant

Untrustworthiness of the declarant may result from a lack of knowledge of the facts, see infra § 214, or from a motive to misrepresent, see infra §§ 215, 216.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 214. Lack of Knowledge

A statement which possesses no probative quality because of the lack of knowledge of the declarant should be rejected.

If a statement, when offered in evidence, is found to possess no probative quality, because the declarant was unable to state the truth of the matter from lack of knowledge or sufficient opportunities for acquiring knowledge, it should be rejected.[26]

Repetition of statement to party
Third person's statement in defendant's absence does not become admissible against defendant merely because thereafter repeated to defendant by witness who heard conversation.—Hunder v. Rindlaub, 237 N.W. 915, 61 N.D. 389.

Declarations to insurance agent
Where the agent procuring the insurance is regarded as the agent of the applicant, declarations made to him by the applicant are not admissible on behalf of plaintiff.—O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co., 50 A. 834, 23 R.I. 457, 91 Am.S.R. 643, 57 L.R.A. 496.

Representations made by bailor
Public representations made by the bailor before the bailment as to the good condition of the property are not admissible in the absence of evidence that they were communicated to the bailee.—Moneyweight Scale Co. v. Woodward, 29 Pa.Super. 142.

Application of rule to original testimony
The rule excluding statements made out of the presence of the adverse party does not apply to original testimony.—Swesnik Loan Co. v. Courtney, 10 N.E.2d 512, 291 Ill.App. 549.

In stock purchaser's action for fraudulent representations as to financial condition of corporation, claimed to have been made to plaintiff and third person, who furnished plaintiff with funds wherewith to buy stocks, defendant was entitled to testify as to his statements to third person, made when plaintiff was not present, notwithstanding deposition of third person, who had died prior to trial, as to such conversation was not offered in evidence by plaintiff.—Taylor v. Manning, 179 N.Y.S. 827, 190 App.Div. 559.

Substitution of administrator of party
In an action on a bond for additional cost of changing an open ditch to a tile drain, where defendant died before trial and his administrator was substituted, evidence of the drainage engineer as to the origin of the proposed change and how it was effected was not objectionable as showing conversations with a party other than defendant, and not in defendant's presence, where the conversation was with the original defendant.—Wilson-Subdrainage Dist. of Harrison-Pottawattamie Drainage Dist. § 215. Motive to Misrepresent in General

An unsworn statement should be rejected where the declarant had a motive to misrepresent.

An unsworn statement should be rejected where the declarant had a motive to misrepresent.[27] Thus an unsworn statement should be excluded where the declarant spoke under the influence of bias,[28] or self interest, see infra § 216, or, post litem motam, under the influence of a controversial spirit.[29]

§ 216. Self-Serving Declarations

a. In general

b. Extent and limitation of rule generally

c. Statements by agent or other persons

a. In General

As a general rule, a self-serving declaration or act of a party is inadmissible in evidence in his favor; and the death of the declarant does not render his self-serving declarations admissible unless they are admissible by reason of statute.

Generally a party cannot make evidence for himself by his own declarations,[30] and it is a well established general rule that a statement of a party, whether oral or written,[31] which is of a self-serv-

Contracts made with third persons after the event are self-serving declarations and are not available as proof.—Nowalk v. Hileman, 180 A. 93, 118 Pa.Super. 322.

Declarations of donee

(1) The declaration of a donee in possession to the effect that he claims the property by gift is inadmissible as substantive evidence of the gift.—Couch v. Couch, 37 So. 405, 141 Ala. 361—28 C.J. p 676 note 22.

(2) Gifts causa mortis cannot be proved by mere hearsay declarations of the alleged donee.

Va.—Thomas v. Lewis, 15 S.E. 389, 89 Va. 1, 37 Am.S R. 848, 18 L.R. A. 170.

Particular declarations held inadmissible

(1) The declarations of insured as to his age, corroborating his statements in the application.—Tuite v. Supreme Forest W. C., 187 S.W. 137, 193 Mo.App. 619.

(2) Self-serving statements as to the terms or meaning of a contract.

of, or in a conversation or correspondence with, the opposing party or his agent,[33] in the absence of assent to their truth by the opposing party, see subdivision b of this section; by having been brought to the attention of the other party or his agent and commented on by him;[34] by having been part of a conversation or correspondence with the declarant's witness;[35] or by being brought out on cross-examination.[36] Such declarations are equally inadmissible when offered by the declarant's representatives, devisees, or heirs,[37] since, as is noted infra this subdivision, the death of a declarant does not render his statements admissible. The rule of exclusion also applies when such declarations are offered in evidence by third persons on their own behalf.[38]

The rule excluding self-serving declarations is a part of the hearsay rule,[39] and its purpose is to prevent the manufacturing of evidence.[40] A self-serving declaration within the rule is one made by a party in his own interest at some place and time out of court and it does not include testimony which he gives as a witness at the trial.[41]

Effect of direct testimony as to same matters. Where there is direct evidence as to the same matters as to which a party's declaration has been admitted in evidence against the objection that it was self-serving, the admission of the declaration, even if technically improper, cannot be regarded as prejudicial error.[42]

Effect of failure to object. Where self-serving declarations are admitted without objection, the evidence cannot afterward be objected to as incompetent.[43]

Self-serving acts. Self-serving acts are but a form of declaration and are within the rule excluding self-serving declarations.[44]

Effect of death of declarant. The death of the declarant does not render his self-serving declarations admissible,[45] except in jurisdictions where the rule has been changed by statute.[46]

Construction of statute
In general, the statute in Massachusetts making admissible the declarations of deceased persons does

b. Extent and Limitation of Rule Generally

Under various circumstances self-serving declarations may nevertheless be admitted, as where they are a part of the res gestæ, or better proof is unavailing, or a declaration against interest has been admitted.

The application of the rule excluding self-serving declarations is governed largely by the same tests which control in the application of the hearsay rule.[47]

The self-serving character of a declaration will not alone warrant its rejection if cogent grounds exist for its admission,[48] and a declaration which, although self-serving on one issue, has independent relevance on another not involving the truth of the statement may be admissible on the latter issue.[49] Likewise oral or written statements, assented to or recognized as true by the adverse party or his representative, are not inadmissible as self-serving declarations.[50] Whether declarations or communications are self-serving is to be determined as of the time they are made,[51] and a statement made by a party or his agent at a time when no motive to misrepresent can exist has been held not to be inadmissible as a self-serving declaration,[52] although not remove any ground of objection except the rule against hearsay, but the statute is construed liberally and makes admissible every declaration within its terms made on personal knowledge, although it does not make admissible mere opinion based upon facts not known to the declarant through his own senses.—Kulchinsky v. Segal, 30 N.E.2d 830, 307 Mass. 571.

47. Okl.—Cowen v. T. J. Stewart Lumber Co., 58 P.2d 573, 177 Okl. 266.

Competent letter containing self-serving statements

Competent letter will not be rejected because containing statements of self-serving character.—National Importing & Trading Co. v. E. A. Bear & Co., 155 N.E. 343, 324 Ill. 346, reversing 236 Ill.App. 426.

Conduct avoiding alienation of affections

Defendants, in action for alienating husband's affections, may show conduct avoiding alienation, although self-serving.—Caplan v. Caplan, 142 A. 121, 83 N.H. 318.

22 C.J. p 230 note 64.

Showing of previous claim

Declarations made by a party in his own interest may be admitted where a failure to assert a claim or right may be construed against the party as an implied negation, or where the assertion of such claim at a later date is attributed to conditions and exigencies which have arisen since the transaction in question, which motive would be disproved by showing earlier declarations to the same effect.—Hotaling v. Hotaling, 203 P. 745, 187 Cal. 695.

Letter not within rule

The letter of an architect, suing for services, stating alleged facts of his employment, and demanding payment, being inadmissible as a self-serving declaration, was not competent to explain, qualify, or aid in the construction of defendant's answering letter, which did not admit the truth of the architect's letter.—Sargent v. Lord, 122 N.E. 761, 232 Mass. 585.

Acts showing physical disability at a time when there would be no excuse for pretension or feigning are not inadmissible as self-serving.—Employers' Liability Assur. Corporation v. Young, Tex.Civ.App., 34 S.W.2d 622, error dismissed.

Routine reports by employees where no motive to misrepresent is present are not inadmissible as self-serving.—Wilkinson v. Phœnix Ry. Co. of Arizona, 236 P. 704, 28 Ariz. 216.

it has been held to the contrary that one cannot manufacture evidence for himself although he may not be interested at the time.[53]

Letters which are a part of a general or mutual correspondence and which are relevant to the issue are admissible although some of them may contain self-serving declarations.[54] Likewise a letter, although of a self-serving character, may be admissible where it throws light on the terms of a contract or shows the interpretation of a contract by the parties,[55] or where it shows that a notice or demand of a particular nature was given[56] and the time when it was given.[57]

That a declaration is self-serving is frequently made the basis of an objection which by no means falls within the scope of the rule, and hence in numerous instances the court has held that under the particular circumstances the declarations, oral or written, sought to be excluded are not inadmissible as self-serving.[58]

Declaration by grantor after conveyance

In an ejectment action, involving the construction of an excepting clause in a deed, grantor's letter, stating what the boundaries were, was not to be excluded as a self-serving declaration, where written after he ceased to have any interest in the property excepted by the deed. Declarations part of the res gestæ. Statements constituting part of the res gestæ are not rendered inadmissible by the fact that they are also self-serving,[59] but a party himself cannot bolster his case by testifying to his own self-serving declarations although they are part of the res gestæ.[60]

Unavailability of better proof. It has been considered in some cases that self-serving declarations may be admitted on the ground of necessity if no better proof is available,[61] such as self-serving declarations in ancient documents or ancient archives.[62]

Statements as to injury or pain. Statements as to the extent of injuries made by the injured person to a physician for the purpose of treatment are not inadmissible as self-serving declarations,[63] but statements made to one other than a physician,[64] or made to a physician for a purpose other than treatment,[65] are inadmissible. Statements by an injured person as to the cause of, or the manner of receiving, the injury, when not a part of the res gestæ, are inadmissible as self-serving,[66] although they are made to a physician,[67] but the physician may testify concerning the statements to show the basis for his diagnosis and treatment.[68]

Statements as to present pain and suffering have been held not inadmissible as self-serving declarations.[69]

Effect of admission of declarations against interest. The admission of declarations against interest does not, according to some authorities, render conflicting and self-serving declarations admissible,[70] but there are cases in which a contrary view has been asserted;[71] and provision is sometimes made by statute for the admission of declarations of a decedent in his own favor after his declarations against interest on the same subject have been introduced in evidence by a party adverse to his personal representatives.[72]

c. Statements by Agents or Other Persons

A party may not introduce the unsworn statements of persons acting in his behalf, such as his agent, employee, attorney, etc., and he may not introduce in his favor the self-serving statements of his predecessor in title. A corporation may not introduce the unsworn statements of one of its officers.

The unsworn declarations of an agent or employee are not admissible on behalf of the principal or employer,[73] and this applies whether the statements were oral or in writing.[74] Likewise, oral or written declarations of an attorney on behalf of his client,[75] of a guardian for his ward,[76] of a principal for his surety,[77] of one defendant on behalf of his codefendant,[78] of one partner on behalf of his copartner,[79] or of a husband or wife for his or her

Declarations of privy. One claiming ownership of property cannot use as evidence in his favor the self-serving declarations of his predecessors in title,[85] although such declarations have been brought to the attention of the opposite party.[86]

§ 217. Declarations against Interest

a. In general
b. Distinctions

a. In General

As an exception to the hearsay rule, declarations against interest are admissible under certain conditions, and may be admissible as proof both of facts directly asserted and of facts incidental thereto and within the scope of the declaration.

Where a person makes a statement which is opposed to his own interest, an inference arises that such statement would not have been made unless it had been true, and, as an exception to the hearsay rule,[87] evidence of such statement may sometimes, as a result of express statutory permission, be received,[88] provided it does not offend against the general rules governing admissibility of evidence.[89] The reception of such evidence is not dependent on the existence of privity between declarant and one of the parties to the suit.[90]

While it has been stated that this class of evidence is not favorably regarded,[91] the objection thereto concerns its weight rather than its competency.[92]

Incidental facts. Declarations against interest are not only received as evidence of the fact directly asserted, but of incidental facts fairly embraced within the scope of the declaration.[93]

Requirements for admission of declaration. By way of summary it has been stated that to render a statement admissible as a declaration against interest the following four requirements must be met: (1) Declarant must be unavailable as a witness. (2) The declaration must have related a fact against the apparent pecuniary or proprietary interest of declarant when his statement was made. (3) The declaration must have concerned a fact personally cognizable by declarant. (4) The circumstances must render it improbable that a motive to falsify existed.[94] These various requirements are discussed in the following sections.

b. Distinctions

Declarations against interest are to be distinguished from admissions and res gestae statements.

Declarations against interest are to be distinguished from other matters.[95]

Admissions. Declarations against interest are entirely distinct from admissions.[96] Admissions amount to a waiver of proof whereas declarations constitute evidence of the fact declared.[97]

97. N.C.—Jelser v. White, 110 S.E. 849, 183 N.C. 126.

As is shown infra § 270 et seq, the admission is primary evidence and is receivable, although declarant is available as a witness; it is competent only when declarant, or someone identified in legal interest with him, is a party to the action; and need not have been considered by declarant as opposed to his interest at the time when it was made. On the other hand, the declaration against interest is in the nature of secondary evidence, receivable only when declarant is unavailable as a witness;[98] it is competent in any action to which it is relevant, although declarant is not a party to, or in privity with, any party to the action;[99] and it must have been, when made, to the knowledge of declarant, against his obvious and real interest.[1]

Res gestæ. A declaration against interest is distinguishable from a res gestæ statement by the fact that it need not accompany or explain a relevant act, although its probative weight is greater where it does accompany or explain such an act.[2]

§ 218. Unavailability of Declarant as Witness

a. In general
b. Declarations of person since deceased

a. In General

Declarations against interest are admissible only where the declarant is unavailable as a witness, and, according to some authorities, unavailability must result from the death of declarant.

Evidence of a declaration against interest must be not only relevant but necessary,[3] as where there is a necessity for resorting to this class of evidence because declarant has died or because some other acceptable reason precludes his appearance as a witness.[4] Being an inferior grade of evidence, it can be received only where there is affirmative proof that it is the best attainable;[5] in other words, that the testimony of the original declarant cannot be procured because he is absent from the jurisdiction of the court,[6] cannot be compelled to testify,[7] or is incapacitated, physically or mentally, from attendance.[8] Some of the cases adopt a very strict view holding that it is only when declarant is dead that his declarations can be received.[9]

The fact that a declarant is unavailable as a witness because of his infamy does not, it has been held, authorize the receipt of his declarations against interest.[10]

b. Declarations of Person Since Deceased

In a proper case, declarations against interest of a person since deceased may be admitted, as in an action for wrongful death, whether or not such declarations are a part of the res gestae and whether or not privity exists between the declarant and a party to the suit.

Where a declarant is unavailable as a witness because of his death, it is well settled that evidence may, in a proper case, be received of his declarations against his interest,[11] whether or not such declarations are part of the res gestæ.[12] The absence of privity between declarant and the parties to the suit does not preclude the admission of his declarations, provided they were adverse to his interests.[13]

Summary of factors governing admissibility

Declarations made by a deceased person as to facts presumably within his knowledge, if relevant to the matter of inquiry, are admissible in testimony as between third parties, first, when it appears that declarant is dead; second, that the declaration was against his pecuniary interest; third, that it was a fact in relation to a matter of which he was personally cognizant; fourth, that declarant had no possible motive to falsify the fact declared.—Jackson v. Consistency of statutes

admission of declarations against interest made by persons since deceased where the declarations were not made with a view to pending litigation.[17]

However, the declarations of a deceased are inadmissible where the circumstances are not such as to bring them within the terms of the particular statute.[18] Under a statute providing for the admission of declarations against interest of a decedent in respect of real property, declarations which concern personal property are not admissible,[19] and under such a statute declarations made by a person after he has conveyed his real property are inadmissible for the reason that the declarations are not against his interest or in respect of his real property.[20]

Death actions. The rule that declarations of a decedent against his interest are admissible has been applied where it is sought to introduce such declarations in a suit for damages for the death of declarant.[21] Declarations of deceased against interest, made after the injury, have been admitted on behalf of defendant to show that the injury was not the cause of death,[22] or that the injury was caused by contributory negligence on the part of deceased.[23] Declarations of deceased against interest made before the injury may be admitted for the purpose of showing the conditions or circumstances existing at the time of the injury.[24] In an action for wrongful death which can be maintained only where decedent could have maintained an action for injuries, it has been held that there is such privity between decedent and those suing for damages for his death as to make his declarations against his interest admissible.[25]

On the other hand, under a statute allowing in evidence declarations against pecuniary interest, it has been held that the declarations of a deceased militating against recovery for his wrongful death are inadmissible for the reason that declarant had no interest in the cause of action for wrongful death and that consequently the declaration could not be against his interest.[26]

§ 219. Nature of Interest of Declarant

a. In general
b. Pecuniary interest
c. Proprietary interest
d. Declarations of assured

a. In General

To be admissible as a declaration against interest, the declaration must have been against an obvious and existing pecuniary or proprietary interest of declarant.

To be admissible as a declaration against interest, the declarant must have had an interest in the subject matter of his declaration.[27]

A declaration is not admissible in evidence unless the interest against which it militated was of either a pecuniary or proprietary nature.[28] Accordingly an unsworn statement of a third person is not

Declarations made over two years before death

That decedent's declarations, relating to oral agreement to give plaintiffs his property in exchange for services, made during agreement, were made more than two years prior to his death, did not affect their admissibility, in action against his estate for value of services as declarations against interest, under Code Civ.Proc. § 1853, if they had a logical tendency to show decedent's understanding as to terms under which plaintiffs were performing alleged services.—Warder v. Hutchison, 231 P. 563, 69 Cal.App. 291.

Existing heart condition

Railroad should be allowed, in death action, to show, as statement against interest, that deceased who fell on station platform recognized weakness of his heart, where death certificate showed that heart disease caused death.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Rowland's Adm'r, 286 S.W. 929, 215 Ky. 663.

admissible merely because it appears to have been against the interest of the declarant by subjecting him to a civil action[29] or to a criminal prosecution.[30] However, the declaration may be admissible where it is against the pecuniary or the proprietary interest of the declarant.[31]

Existing interest. The declarant must have possessed an actual interest, real or apparent, at the time when his declaration was made.[32] This rule excludes declarations of a former owner of the property,[33] or of a prospective heir thereto.[34]

Obvious interest. The interest of the declarant must have been so obvious and direct as presumably to have been present in his mind at the time of the declaration,[35] and accordingly a declaration which would be against interest only in certain remote or improbable contingencies is not competent.[36]

b. Pecuniary Interest

Declarations are admissible where they are against the pecuniary interest of the declarant, as in the case of an acknowledgment of indebtedness or of payment.

Where the declarant had adequate knowledge of the facts stated, and primary evidence cannot be procured, the declaration is admissible if made against his pecuniary interest.[37] Thus the declaration is admissible where it amounts to an acknowledgment of declarant's indebtedness to others,[38] or that nothing is due him on a particular account,[39] or to a concession of the receipt[40] or misappropriation[41] of money, or that he is liable for an increased share of a common obligation,[42] or is individually liable for the whole claim.[43]

However, to render declarations admissible as against pecuniary interest it is necessary that they be, in fact, against such interest,[44] and that the declarant's pecuniary interest relate to the subject matter of his declaration.[45]

c. Proprietary Interest

In a proper case, declarations are admissible where they are against the proprietary interest of the declarant, as in the case of declarations in disparagement of title to real or personal property or in respect of boundaries.

Admissibility of confessions of guilt as declarations against interest in criminal prosecutions see Criminal Law § 749.

Arson

Where insurer claimed that property was burned as result of conspiracy between insured and one who fired the property, latter's confession is not admissible against insured, in an action on the policy, on the theory it was a declaration against interest, the rule applying only to declarations against pecuniary interest.—Royal Ins. Co. v. Taylor, W.Va., 254 F. 805, 166 C.C.A. 251.

"Penal interest" in addition to pecuniary or proprietary interest

The statement of a decedent that he had fired first in a shooting affray was admissible as against his pecuniary and proprietary interest. The court stated that such declaration was also against the "penal interest" of decedent, intimating that this was an additional ground for holding that the declaration was competent evidence.—Reed v. Philpot's Adm'r, 31 S.W.2d 709, 235 Ky. 429.

petent, the primary evidence being unattainable, if it was against the proprietary interest of the declarant.[46] Thus a declaration is admissible where it is in disparagement of declarant's title,[47] as where one in possession of a chattel or chose in action declares that he is not its absolute owner,[48] or that he has made a gift[49] or other transfer[50] of it, or holds it in trust;[51] or where an heir at law states the existence of a will of his ancestor.[52] A declaration by an owner of land to the effect that his use of a way over adjacent land was permissive in its origin and not adverse is admissible in a suit for obstruction of the way.[53]

Declarations by person in possession of land. In a proper case, declarations of persons in possession of land against their proprietary interest therein may be received in evidence.[54] Thus a declaration may be admitted where a person in actual possession of realty under an apparent claim of ownership concedes that he holds in trust,[55] or as tenant rather than owner,[56] as a tenant for life,[57] or under another person,[58] or holds or owns less than the entire interest,[59] or states that he does not claim to own the land,[60] that he has never received a deed conveying it to him,[61] that he has conveyed it by deed to another[62] or has dedicated it to public use,[63] that a deed by which he conveyed it was a deed of gift,[64] that a document conferring on him an additional interest in the land has been canceled,[65] or that someone other than himself owns the property.[66]

Boundaries. In a proper case, statements concerning boundaries may be admissible as declarations against interest.[67] Declarations of landowners made during the time of their ownership and adverse to their interests may be admissible in evidence as tending to show the location of boundaries designated by grants, deeds, or wills.[68]

footing different from that governing the admissibility of declarations against interest,[69] and while statements concerning boundaries may be against interest and offered in evidence as declarations against interest, in which case their admissibility will be controlled by the general rules governing this class of evidence, they may also be offered merely as declarations concerning boundaries, whether or not adverse to the interest of the speaker, and in the latter case their admissibility will be controlled by the rules considered infra §§ 234, 249.

d. Declarations of Assured

Declarations of an assured, since deceased, made at a time when he had a vested interest in a life insurance policy and showing facts precluding recovery on the policy may be admissible as declarations against interest.

Declarations of an assured, since deceased, tending to show facts which would preclude recovery on a policy of life insurance may be admissible as declarations against his pecuniary or proprietary interest where the policy is payable to the assured or his estate, or where it is payable to another with a reserved right to change the beneficiary.[70]

On the other hand, if the assured at the time of his declarations is without authority to change the beneficiary, the beneficiary rather than the assured has the vested right in the policy and therefore declarations of the assured cannot be against his own interest and may not be admitted as declarations against interest.[71]

§ 220. Knowledge of Declarant

It is requisite to the admissibility of a declaration against interest that the declarant have knowledge of the subject of his declaration.

It is essential to relevancy in the declaration that the declarant should have adequate knowledge with respect to the subject covered by his statement.[72]

§ 221. Absence of Motive to Misrepresent

To render a declaration against interest admissible, there should be a guarantee of the trustworthiness of the declaration.

To be admissible as a declaration against interest, there should be a circumstantial guarantee of the trustworthiness of the declaration.[73] While it has been stated that the declarant should have been

Declaration of suicidal intent
(1) Declarations made by insured after taking poison that she did not care to live were admissible in beneficiary's action on life policy where insured had retained right to change beneficiary so that statement indicating suicidal intent was against his own pecuniary interest.—Martorella v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 264 N.Y.S. 751, 238 App.Div. 532.

(2) Declarations of suicidal intent have been held admissible to preclude recovery of double indemnity for accidental death under life policy.—Wirthlin v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., C.C.A.Utah, 56 F.2d 137, 86 A.L.R. 138.

Showing falsity of insurance application
Statements of insured to physician that he had had severe cough and syphilis were competent to show falsity of statements, in application for life policy.—Grand Lodge, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Johnson, 15 S.W.2d 499, 228 Ky. 669.

Interest as vested in assured and not in beneficiary
Where life policy provided that beneficiary was subject to change at any time by act of insured and that policy was void if insured should die by his own hand within one year from the date thereof, the beneficiary had no vested interest until the death of the insured without change of beneficiary, and therefore declarations of insured that he intentionally shot himself are admissible as against his interest.—Commonwealth Life Ins. Circumstances at time of declaration as decisive
In determining whether affidavit of depositor that all withdrawals from account were made by her or with her consent, contradicting depositor's testimony in husband's suit for deposit as funds belonging to community of acquêts and gains was admissible on retrial after depositor's death, affidavit should be examined in light of circumstances existing at time it was made in order to resolve whether it carried requisite guaranty of truthfulness in order to be admitted as a statement against interest.—Demasi v. Whitney Trust & Savings Bank, supra.

free from any motive to misrepresent,[74] such statement means merely that where there exists both a self-serving and a self-disserving interest, the latter must preponderate over the self-serving interest.[75] If the portion of a declaration ostensibly against interest can be separated from a self-serving portion, the self-serving portion is rejected, while if it cannot be so separated the entire declaration may be rejected;[76] and it has been considered that, if the statements in favor of the declarant equal or preponderate over those against his interest, the declaration cannot be received.[77] When the receipt of interest is indorsed on an instrument with the apparent effect of removing the bar of limitations, evidence of such a statement will not be received without affirmative and satisfactory proof that the indorsement was made at a time when it was against the real interest of declarant.[78]

In the absence of a coexisting self-serving interest, the mere fact that the statement is against the declarant's interest furnishes very satisfactory assurance that it was not made under the influence of a motive to misrepresent,[79] and indeed constitutes a strong guaranty of truth.[80] The character of the declaration also dispenses with any necessity that it should have been made ante litem motam.[81]

§ 222. Adverse Character of Declaration Generally

To be admissible as a declaration against interest, the statement must have been actually against the interest of declarant at the time it was made.

In order for a declaration to be admissible as a declaration against interest, it must clearly appear that the statement of the declarant was actually against his interest[82] at the time when it was made;[83] otherwise the statement will not be admitted.[84]

Declarations of grantor before and after conveyance. It has been held that a grantor's declarations made both before and after the execution of his deed may be admissible as declarations against interest.[85] However, according to other authorities, declarations of a grantor are inadmissible if made before acquiring title[86] or after parting with title.[87]

Voluntary character of statement

Where testimony of deponent, since deceased, was procured over deponent's express objections and under compulsion of purported authority of law, deposition which was inadmissible as such because of lack of substantial compliance with statutes authorizing depositions, was not admissible as a "declaration against interest."—McLean v. § 223. Declarations of Former Holder of Negotiable Paper

Declarations against interest of a former holder of negotiable paper may be admissible where the declarant is deceased or otherwise unavailable as a witness, provided his possession of the paper has first been proved by competent evidence.

The declarations against interest of a former holder of negotiable paper may be admissible where the declarant is deceased or otherwise unavailable as a witness.[88] In such a case the fact of possession of the paper must be independently proved before the declaration becomes admissible; the declaration is not competent to prove the fact of possession.[89]

§ 224. Form of Declaration

The form of a declaration against interest is ordinarily immaterial; it may be admitted whether it is oral, written, or printed.

A declaration against interest may be oral[90] or in writing,[91] there being no general distinction between the two forms of statement with regard to admissibility;[92] and such declarations may even be in printed form.[93]

Declarations against interest have been admitted when they appeared in accounts,[94] deeds,[95] entries,[96] evidence given on a former occasion,[97] indorsements,[98] inventories,[99] letters,[1] purported testamentary instruments,[2] receipts,[3] tax returns,[4] and in the enrollment of a vessel.[5] Admissions by contract have been treated as within the rule where the declarant has died.[6]

§ 225. Declarations in Course of Business or Performance of Duty

The authorities differ as to the admissibility of declarations made in the course of business or in the performance of a duty, or of conduct equivalent to such declarations; ordinarily written entries are, and oral declarations are not, admitted.

It has been laid down that entries made by a person in the ordinary course of his business, of acts which his duty in such business requires him to do, are, in case of his death,[7] or where he is otherwise unavailable as a witness,[8] admissible evidence of the act so done, although the entries are not against the interest of the person making them; but there are cases in which written declarations in the course of business have been rejected.[9]

Oral declarations. In the United States oral declarations made while the declarant was acting in the course of duty are generally excluded under the hearsay rule,[10] although there are cases in which such declarations have been admitted[11] where necessary to prevent a failure of justice.[12] In any event, irrelevant declarations are inadmissible.[13]

Conduct. It has been considered that the conduct of a person in the course of his official duties or business may be shown, although its only probative force consists in the fact that it implies a declaration to a particular effect;[14] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[15]

§ 226. Declarations as to Pedigree

a. In general
b. Proof of declarations

In General

As an exception to the rule excluding hearsay evidence, under proper conditions an unsworn statement is admissible on an issue of pedigree.

Subject to the limitations and restrictions considered infra §§ 227–232, an unsworn statement of a competent declarant concerning matters of genealogy is, sometimes as a result of express statutory regulation, admissible,[16] unless it is irrele-

Exception to general principle

Rule that bills of lading, issued by master of vessel who has died, are admissible against buyer on issue of when goods were shipped, is exception to general principle that bill of lading is mere declaration of person who signs it, incompetent as proof of shipment against any one else.—London Produce Co. v. In an action for damages for breach of defendant's contract to sell plaintiff a dental business, testimony of plaintiff buyer's former employer that at the time plaintiff claimed the contract with defendant was made he notified such employer that he was going to leave, and stated that he had made some arrangement with defendant, was erroneously admitted since plaintiff's declaration out of court was received as proof of the vital issue in the case that the contract had been made between him and defendant, and not as proof that the contract was being made.—Brown v. vant.[17] This rule constitutes a well established exception to the hearsay rule.[18]

Such a declaration furnishes a probative inference of the truth of the facts directly asserted,[19] and is admissible as a matter of necessity because of the difficulty or inability of obtaining other evidence.[20] Such declarations have been regarded as primary evidence of the fact asserted.[21]

b. Proof of Declarations

Ordinarily declarations as to pedigree may not be proved by hearsay evidence or by affidavit; but, except for evidence of reputation which usually is limited to members of the family, any competent witness, including the person to whom the declaration relates, may testify thereto.

A declaration as to pedigree may not be proved by hearsay evidence.[22] Further, an affidavit containing evidence of the declaration is not admissible,[23] unless its reception is authorized by statute.[24]

Competency of witness. Any person who is a competent witness may testify on a matter of pedigree as to a declaration which was heard by him.[25]

With regard to reputation in the family, however, although there is some authority to the contrary,[26] it is usually held that the reporting witness must be a member of the family by birth or marriage,[27] and that such reputation cannot be proved by neighbors[28] or other members of the community;[29] but a witness whose knowledge of family matters was derived from intimate acquaintance with the family may testify as to facts of family history, such evidence being personal knowledge rather than mere hearsay.[30]

Testimony concerning one's self. It has been held proper, where the evidence is otherwise competent, for one to testify to facts of family history which relate to him,[31] such as the identity of his parents,[32] or other relations,[33] or the place of his birth,[34] or, as appears in infra § 227 b, his age.

Conclusion of witness. Where it is desired to show a declaration as to pedigree, the statement itself must be given in evidence and it is not permissible for a witness to state his deduction therefrom,[35] except where claimant seeks to reach the estate of the declarant himself and not to establish a right through him to the property of others.[36]

a. In general
b. Age
c. Death

a. In General

Declarations of pedigree may include, and are frequently admissible as evidence of, any notable facts in the family history, such as matters relating to birth, descent, heirship, etc.

The facts regarded as those of genealogy or pedigree, take a wide range, and embrace any notable fact in the life of a member of the family or in the family history.[37] Thus declarations may include and, except where it is required that there be a distinct issue of pedigree, see § 231 infra, are admissible as evidence of, matters relating to birth,[38] descent,[39] and such as evidence of matters relat-

the relationships stated may be that of husband,[57] wife,[58] child,[59] grandchild,[60] uncle,[61] nephew,[62] and niece.[63] The declarant may state his own relationship to the family.[64]

The pedigree of an animal may, it has been held, be established by hearsay evidence or general reputation.[65]

b. Age

Declarations which meet the requirements of the pedigree rule may include, and frequently are admissible as evidence of, the age of a person. A witness may testify to his own age.

Hearsay evidence is not admissible to prove the age of another.[66]

However, under the pedigree rule, age is regarded as a genealogical fact, and declarations which meet the requirements of that rule, see §§ 228–232 infra, may include, and ordinarily are admissible as evidence of, the age of a person,[67] although in some jurisdictions the admissibility of such declarations to prove age depends on the existence of a distinct issue of pedigree.[68] Reputation in the family[69] and family tradition[70] are admissible to prove age; and it has been held that members of the family of the person in question,[71] or others having an intimate acquaintance with the family,[72] may testify as to age, although their testimony is based on family tradition or reputation.[73]

Testimony as to own age. Although his testimony be confessedly based on hearsay,[74] direct or composite,[75] a witness may testify to his own age,[76] as this is a fact of which he may be said to have knowledge based on family tradition.[77]

Such testimony has been regarded as original, direct, and primary evidence.[78] It is admissible without regard to other or better evidence which has been introduced or which is available,[79] and it is immaterial that the witness' parents are alive and available, or that they actually testify.[80]

c. Death

Authorities differ as to whether death may be proved by hearsay evidence apart from the pedigree rule, although declarations which meet the requirements of the pedigree rule may include, and ordinarily are admissible as evidence of, the death of a person.

While in some cases it has been broadly held, without reference to the pedigree rule, that death may be proved by hearsay evidence,[81] according to other cases hearsay evidence is inadmissible to prove death,[82] at least where the fact is susceptible of definite proof and is of recent occurrence.[83] However, under the pedigree rule death is regarded as a genealogical fact, and declarations which meet the requirements of that rule, see §§ 228–232 infra,

In Texas
(1) Evidence as to result of inquiries made by witness in counties where certain person once lived and was last heard of is inadmissible as hearsay on issue of his death.—Soria v. American Nat. Ins. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 57 S.W.2d 321.

(2) However, it has been held that death may be proved by hearsay.—Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Alred, Tex.Civ.App., 4 S.W.2d 666, error refused, followed in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hill, Tex.Civ.App., 4 S.W.2d 668, error refused—York v. Hilger, Civ.App., 84 S.W. 1117.

(3) Evidence that witness was informed by a person, since dead, of the death of another person is admissible.—Turner v. Sealock, 54 S.W. 358, 21 Tex.Civ.App. 594.

83. N.Y.—Fosgate v. Herkimer Mfg. & Hydraulic Co., 12 Barb. 352, affirmed 12 N.Y. 580.

Where there is positive evidence of individual's death, hearsay evidence may be excluded.—Williams v. Alabama Fuel & Iron Co., 102 So. 136, 212 Ala. 159.

After lapse of time
Hearsay evidence as proof of death is admissible only after a considerable lapse of time.—Stouvenel v. Stephens, 26 How.Pr.N.Y., 244—17 C.J. p 1177 note 39.

Declaration by administrator out of court as to date of death has no probative force as evidence of death or time of death.—Harris v. State Bank, 97 N.Y.S. 1044, 49 Misc. 458.

Finding and burial of body
Hearsay evidence of finding and burial of body of person is inadmissible.—Jackson v. Etz, 5 Cow.,N.Y., 314.

may include, and ordinarily are admissible as evidence of, the death of a person,[84] although in some jurisdictions the admissibility of such declarations to prove death depends on the existence of a distinct issue of pedigree.[85]

A newspaper announcement of the death of an individual is not admissible to prove the fact of such person's death.[86]

Composite statements. While a mere rumor or belief that a person died at a certain time is no evidence of his being dead,[87] at least where the source of the rumor is not stated,[88] yet evidence of reputation in the family[89] or in the community,[90] or family tradition,[91] has been held admissible to establish the fact of death, provided there has been a considerable lapse of time.[92]

Cause or manner of death. Hearsay evidence is inadmissible to prove the manner or cause of death, as, for example, to prove suicide.[93]

§ 228. Competency of Declarant in General

To render declarations as to pedigree admissible, it must appear that declarant would have been qualified as a witness, that he had mental capacity, had knowledge of the facts stated, and was free of any motive to misrepresent the facts.

In order to render declarations as to pedigree admissible, it must appear that the declarant would

Recital in deed
A recital in a deed that the record owner of the fee is dead and that one of the subscribing grantors is her daughter and heir at law is admissible to prove the death of such person, the deed being signed not only by the daughter but by the brothers and sisters of the person alleged to be dead, since the oral declarations of the persons so related would be competent proof of the death—Postlewaite v. Wise, 17 W.Va. 1.

have been qualified to testify as a witness.[94] Declarant must be possessed of sufficient intelligence to know his relatives, and if he has that capacity his declarations are admissible on an issue of pedigree, although he is incompetent to manage his property.[95] In addition, it must be affirmatively shown[96] that the declarant had actual knowledge as to the facts stated by him[97] or such opportunity for acquiring knowledge as leads to a reasonable inference that he possessed such knowledge.[98]

Absence of motive to misrepresent. In order for a declaration as to pedigree to be admissible, it is necessary that the declarant should have been disinterested[99] to the extent of having no motive which can fairly be assumed to be such as would induce him to state the fact otherwise than as he understood it.[1] The statement must therefore be shown to have been made ante litem motam;[2] and a fortiori it must have been made before commencement of a suit involving the issue to which the declaration relates.[3]

However, it is not material that the parties had had a mere difference;[4] that there had been an unrelated controversy;[5] that a controversy had arisen regarding a cognate matter,[6] unless it clearly foreshadowed one on the precise subject matter of the declaration;[7] that a controversy, since entirely abated, once existed;[8] or that a state of affairs was known to exist out of which a controversy might at any time arise.[9] On the other hand, the declara-

Mere possibility of bias
Statement of insured in application for insurance was admissible as exception to hearsay rule without violating rule requiring that statement must have been made ante litem motam, notwithstanding alleged interest of insured to misrepresent, since mere possibility of bias or desire to misrepresent was insufficient to warrant exclusion.—New York Life Ins. Co. v. McQuie, 126 S.W.2d 458, 277 Ky. 268.

tion is inadmissible if a controversy in fact existed, although the declarant was ignorant of it,[10] or it had not reached the stage of litigation.[11]

A declaration made expressly with a view to a probable future contest is admissible for what it is worth,[12] and the same is true of a declaration made with the express purpose of preventing disputes;[13] but declarations made in the process of collecting evidence to substantiate the claim involved in a subsequent action are incompetent.[14]

Declarations made ante litem motam may be received although they are in support of the declarant's interest,[15] and although the declarant was in the same situation touching the subject matter of the controversy as the party relying on the declarations.[16]

§ 229. Relationship to Family and Proof Thereof

a. In general
b. Proof of relationship

a. In General

A declaration of pedigree generally must be made by someone related by birth or affinity to the family concerned.

While there appears to be some authority to the contrary,[17] as a general rule, for a declaration of pedigree to be admissible, it must have been made by someone related to the family concerned.[18] Consequently, under the general rule the courts will not receive declarations as to pedigree made by intimate friends[19] or neighbors,[20] or even by persons

Early tendency to the contrary
(1) It was the early tendency to regard intimate acquaintance with the family as a sufficient basis for knowledge as to facts of pedigree, and thus declarations of intimate friends were received.

living in the family[21] or by servants,[22] however trustworthy[23] or however long employed in the family.[24]

However, it is not essential that declarant belong to the same branch of the family as the person to whom the declaration relates;[25] nor is it necessary that the degree of relationship existing between declarant and the person in question should be made out, if some relationship is shown.[26]

Where the issue is as to the relationship between two persons, a showing that a declarant was related to one of them is sufficient to render his declarations admissible, and it is not necessary that declarant be shown to have been related to both persons.[27]

Consanguinity or affinity. The relationship of declarant to the family may be by birth,[28] or, according to numerous authorities, by affinity.[29] Accordingly, the declarations of the husband of a person connected with the family by birth,[30] or of the wife of such person,[31] are admissible.

However, the declarations of the father[32] or sister[33] of a wife with respect to matters of pedigree of the husband's family have been held to be incompetent.

Legitimacy. While it is usually considered that in order to render a declaration as to pedigree admissible it is necessary that the relationship of declarant to the family should be of a legitimate character,[34] and, therefore, a bastard's declarations as to the pedigree of his putative family, or conversely, the declarations of a member of the family as to a bastard, are not admissible,[35] there are cases in which the courts have shown a tendency to relax the rule.[36]

b. Proof of Relationship

The relationship of the declarant to the family concerned must be proved by evidence, direct or circumstantial, other than the statements of the declarant, although only slight proof is rquired.

In order to render a declaration as to pedigree admissible, the relationship of declarant to the family concerned must, except where it is admitted,[37] be established by evidence[38] other than the statements of declarant himself.[39]

The evidence to prove relationship may be either direct[40] or circumstantial, such as declarant's bearing the family name[41] or a name identical with that of the subject of the declaration,[42] recognition of declarant by the family,[43] or mention of him in family conveyances[44] and other dispositions of property.[45] However, it has also been held that mere identity of names, religion, and nativity are insufficient to show relationship.[46]

Declaration concerning declarant himself. Independent evidence of relationship is not required where the declaration concerns declarant himself,[47] as where claimant seeks to reach the estate of declarant, and not to establish a right through him to the property of others.[48]

Sufficiency of evidence. The evidence must be sufficient to establish relationship prima facie, to the satisfaction of the court;[49] but a prima facie showing is sufficient,[50] and it has been stated that only slight proof of the relationship will be required.[51]

Effect of statutes

Under statutes placing bastards in exactly the same position as legitimate children with respect to their mother, it would seem that declarations should be admitted where relationship is that of mother and bastard child.—Northrop v. Hale, 76 Me. 306, 49 Am.R. 615—22 C.J. p 245 note 69.

§ 230. Unavailability of Direct Evidence

Declarations of pedigree generally will not be received when better evidence is available; such declarations are not admissible unless declarant is dead, or is otherwise unavailable.

It is a guiding principle, applicable in pedigree as in other cases, that declarations will not be received when better evidence is available.[52] As a general rule, declarations as to pedigree are not admissible unless declarant is dead,[53] although the rule is sometimes relaxed to the extent of receiving such declarations where declarant is otherwise unavailable,[54] as where he is beyond the jurisdiction of the court,[55] or is incapable of testifying.[56]

In accordance with the principle that declarations will not be received when better evidence is available, it has been held that a declaration otherwise admissible is rendered inadmissible where living members of the same family can be examined as witnesses on the same point;[57] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[58]

§ 231. Necessity That Pedigree Be in Issue

Authorities differ as to whether the rule admitting declarations as to pedigree is limited to cases where pedigree itself is directly in issue. An admissible declaration is evidence of facts incidentally or inferentially stated.

It has been laid down that declarations as to pedigree can be received only where pedigree itself is directly in issue.[59] However, the rule adopted in many cases is that the fact that pedigree is relevant to the issue is sufficient to admit the evidence,[60] and that declarations as to matters of genealogy or facts incidentally connected therewith are admissible as proof of the fact or facts contained therein in any case in which such facts are relevant, regardless of whether pedigree is separately in issue;[61]

In Missouri

(1) It has been held that there is no sufficient reason for restricting the admissibility of such evidence to cases involving pedigree.—State and further support for this rule may be found supra § 227, in cases in effect applying it without expressly recognizing it.

Particular matters, which pedigree declarations have been held not admissible to prove, include army service,[62] pauper settlement,[63] freedom,[64] the color of a child's father,[65] nonaccess of a husband,[66] or the source of money.[67]

Incidental or inferential facts. On an inquiry as to pedigree, an admissible unsworn statement is evidence not only of facts directly asserted by it, see § 226 a supra, but also of such relevant facts as may be incidentally[68] or inferentially[69] stated, such as the dates at which[70] or, according to some authorities, the localities in which[71] events of genealogical importance, such as births, deaths, and marriages, took place, names,[72] number,[73] residence of a branch of the family,[74] or their ownership of property.[75]

§ 232. Form of Declaration

a. In general
b. Composite statements

a. In General

A pedigree declaration which is authentic may be in any form, oral or written, and it may be implied from conduct. A written statement must have been written by, or under the direction of, a competent declarant.

A declaration relating to pedigree may be in any form capable of conveying thought,[76] provided the authenticity of the vehicle conveying the statement is established to the satisfaction of the court by evidence dehors itself,[77] as by recognition in the family[78] or production from proper custody.[79] However, the declaration must be a statement of fact, and not merely the opinion of the members of the family.[80]

The declaration may be oral[81] or in writing;[82] the oral statement is as competent as written evidence on the same point.[83]

Conduct of members of family; acquiescence. Facts of family history may be circumstantially established by the conduct of members of the family,[84] which evinces a belief or opinion on the sub-

v. Bowman, 213 S.W. 64, 278 Mo. 492.

(2) Further, it has been stated that "the character of the litigation in which the evidence is offered is immaterial. It is the nature of the statement which determines its admissibility, and not the character of the litigation in which it is offered" —Rauch v. Metz, 212 S.W. 357, 362.

(3) However, it has also been held that hearsay evidence is not admissible under the pedigree rule where pedigree is not at issue.—Bailey v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., App., 115 S.W.2d 151, certiorari quashed State ex rel. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Shain, 121 S.W.2d 789, 343 Mo. 435—Tuite v. Supreme Forest W. C., 187 S.W. 137, 193 Mo.App. 619.

Direct evidence

In an action by a nonresident alien for the death of her son, testimony of a relative and frequent visitor of the family that plaintiff treated decedent as her son and called him her son, and decedent treated plaintiff as his mother and had spoken of her as his mother, was competent to establish the relationship, being di-

ject.[85] It has been asserted that the statements of a deceased relative are not to be regarded as separate and distinct conversations, but are to be taken as indivisible, indicating the treatment of the person whose pedigree is in dispute.[86]

For reasons analogous to those on which "admissions by acquiescence" by a party are based, see §§ 294–297 infra, statements made by any person,[87] in any form,[88] are admissible as evidence of any facts of family history asserted, provided it affirmatively appears by direct or circumstantial evidence[89] the statement was brought to the attention of a member of the family who would be interested in correcting a mistake,[90] and his conduct, in connection with such assertion, indicated acquiescence in, or assent to, the statement.[91] It must also affirmatively appear that the declaration concerns the subject of the inquiry.[92]

Monuments and portraits. Monumental inscriptions[93] and family portraits[94] are regarded as admissible if sufficiently authenticated as genuine, as by having been received as such by the family.

Requirements as to written instruments. Written statements as to pedigree are equally admissible whether they were made by a person whose oral declarations to the same effect would be competent,[95] or by some other person under his direction.[96] It must appear, however, that the writing was made by, or under the direction of, a competent declarant or that it was acknowledged by a competent declarant as a correct family memorial,[97] except where it is in the form of an entry in a family Bible or testament which is produced from the proper custody, in which event the assent of the family is presumed.[98] The admissibility of the writing is not affected by the fact that the instrument is not valid and effectual for its original purpose.[99]

The statement may be contained in an affidavit;[1] an application for an allotment of land,[2] or for a bank account,[3] or for insurance;[4] articles of separation between husband and wife;[5] a deed;[6] a deposition;[7] a family Bible,[8] genealogical table,[9] or

Evidence of reputation or tradition in the family is admissible under the pedigree rule.

Reputation in the family gives rise to an inference of the existence of facts of family genealogy.[20] Thus reputation in the family gives rise to the existence of such facts as birth,[21] descent,[22] failure of issue,[23] heirship,[24] identity,[25] marriage,[26] celibacy,[27] parentage,[28] or relationship;[29] or facts incidentally connected with genealogy, such as residence[30] or the dates of events of family history;[31] and evidence of such reputation will be received on an issue of pedigree[32] concerning any member of any branch of the family.[33] While it has been laid down in a number of cases that general reputation in a neighborhood or vicinity is competent,[34] much that has been stated in many of these cases has been described as dictum,[35] and the accepted rule appears to be that the only reputation which may be shown is reputation among those who would be competent declarants, so that reputation outside of the family is inadmissible,[36] except under unusual circumstances.[37]

In Alabama

(1) It has been held that general reputation and common report in immediate neighborhood as well as in families of parties are admissible to show affiliation.—Cavin v. Cavin, 185 So. 741, 237 Ala. 185—McCrary v. Matthews, 179 So. 367, 235 Ala. 409—Martin v. Martin, 171 So. 734, 233 Ala. 310—Lay v. Fuller, 59 So. 609, 178 Ala. 375.

(2) However, it has also been held that only reputation in family is admissible to prove pedigree.—Elder v. State, 26 So. 213, 123 Ala. 35—22 C.J. p 249 note 39 [a] (2).

The rule applicable to direct statements that the declarant must be dead, see § 230 supra, has been held not to apply where the evidence is of family reputation;[38] but there is also authority for the view that the only reputation which may be shown is reputation among deceased members of the family.[39] It is also necessary that the reputation should have existed among distinterested persons, and consequently reputation is competent only as it existed ante litem motam.[40]

The admissibility of composite hearsay, such as evidence of reputation, tradition, or rumor, is considered generally in §§ 195–199 supra.

Tradition. Tradition in the family, being a form of family history[41] or reputation,[42] is admissible to prove facts of genealogy.[43] Thus tradition is admissible to prove such facts as birth,[44] descent,[45] marriage,[46] parentage,[47] or relationship[48] on any inquiry as to pedigree.

It has been held that evidence of tradition in the family is inadmissible unless the members of the family among whom it arose are dead.[49]

§ 233. Declarations as to Matters of Public and General Interest

Under certain conditions, an unsworn statement is admissible to prove matters of public or general interest.

Subject to the limitations and restrictions considered in §§ 234–237 infra, it is the rule that in proving relevant matters of public or general interest[50] an unsworn statement affords an inference of the truth of the facts asserted,[51] and is therefore admissible as evidence of such facts.[52]

Facts incidentally asserted. As to facts which are merely incidentally and not directly asserted, the declaration is not admissible.[53] It has been held, however, that a declaration is admissible where it undertakes to locate a matter of public interest by reference to the location of something else, such as a house.[54]

§ 234. Subject of Declaration

a. In general
b. Private boundaries

a. In General

Various subjects have been regarded as of sufficient public interest to warrant the admission of declarations; declarations as to matters of private interest are ordinarily inadmissible.

Among subjects of sufficient public interest to admit evidence of declarations concerning them are: The boundaries of public corporations;[55] the incorporation of municipalities;[56] the location of highways,[57] or streets,[58] or of large navigable watercourses;[59] and the public ownership of lands.[60]

Matters of private interest. Except in the case of private boundaries, see subdivision b of this section, the rule under discussion does not apply to matters other than those of public or general interest.[61]

b. Private Boundaries

Under certain conditions, unsworn statements are ordinarily admissible to prove the location of private boundaries, or their landmarks, or related facts.

Subject to the limitations or restrictions considered in §§ 235–238 infra, unsworn statements may be received as evidence of private boundaries, where such boundaries are ancient[62] or coincide with public boundaries.[63]

Moreover, in other boundary cases, while there exists some authority to the contrary,[64] it is generally the rule, resulting from necessity,[65] that such declarations, if otherwise competent,[66] may be admitted as to the location of the boundary,[67] its landmarks,[68] and other facts relating thereto.[69] Further declarations made at the same time as to matters other than those of boundary are not admissible.[70]

The admissibility of a declaration as to private boundaries as an independently relevant statement is considered in § 249 infra.

§ 235. Competency of Declarant and Proof Thereof

In order that a declaration as to matters of public or general interest be admissible, it must appear that the declarant would have been qualified as a witness, that he had adequate knowledge of the facts, that he was disinterested, and that the declaration was made ante litem motam.

In order that a declaration as to matters of public or general interest be admissible, it must appear that the declarant would have been qualified as a witness at the time the declaration is offered in evidence;[71] and, if so, a declaration in relation to boundaries is not rendered inadmissible by the fact

Knowledge of facts. In order that a declaration as to matters of public and general interest be admissible, it must be shown that the declarant had actual knowledge of the facts.[73] Similarly, as to matters of quasi public interest, such as the location of private boundaries,[74] their landmarks,[75] or particular facts connected therewith,[76] it is well established that it must be shown that the declarant had adequate[77] knowledge; but the existence of such knowledge may be proved circumstantially.[78]

Knowledge of boundaries of land, sufficient to qualify persons as declarants, may be attributed to surveyors of the land,[79] chain carriers[80] having sufficient technical training to recognize the professional significance of what they observe,[81] or others intelligently coöperating in the survey;[82] but the declarations of the surveyor or those who assisted him are not, without more, admissible to fix the locality of the survey.[83] Sufficient knowledge may also be attributed to owners of the property while in possession,[84] and to owners of premises adjoining those as to the boundaries of which the declarations are offered in evidence;[85] but the declarations of an owner as to the boundary between two adjoining tracts are inadmissible unless the source of his information is shown.[86]

However, while such facts may have evidentiary value as to declarant's knowledge,[87] it need not be shown that the declarant was, at the time of the declaration as to the boundary, the owner or occupant of the land or that he had been such owner or occupant,[88] or that the declaration was made while the declarant was on the land or engaged in pointing out the bounds of his estate,[89] although it has been held in some states that a surveyor's declarations are competent only when made on the premises.[90]

Absence of motive to misrepresent. The declarant must have been disinterested,[91] that is, he must have been without such interest to misrepresent the facts as would render his declaration untrustworthy,[92] and must not have been exposed to bias[93] or the warmth generated by controversy.[94] The declaration must, therefore, have been made ante litem motam.[95]

It is not conclusive against the reception of a declaration that it is self-serving,[96] although the probative effect of the declaration is increased where it is against the interest of the declarant.[97]

§ 236. Unavailability of Direct Evidence

Declarations as to matters of public interest or as to private boundaries are admissible when declarant is dead, or according to some authorities, is otherwise unavailable as a witness.

Unsworn statements as to matters of public interest generally,[98] as well as declarations regarding the location or marks of private boundaries,[99] are admissible when the declarant is dead, or, it has been held, is otherwise unavailable as a witness,[1] although in some jurisdictions absence from the jurisdiction is regarded as insufficient to admit the evidence.[2]

It has been held that, if the declarant is dead, his declaration may be shown notwithstanding there is a living witness who could testify to the same matter.[3]

§ 237. Form of Declaration

Declarations as to matters of public interest or private boundaries may be made in various forms, including conduct tantamount to a declaration.

in various forms, and may even be made by conduct tantamount to a declaration.[6]

Written declarations have been held to be proper which were made in the form of deeds,[7] depositions,[8] field notes,[9] plans,[10] and surveys.[11]

§ 238. Dying Declarations

Dying declarations generally are not admissible in civil cases, although in some jurisdictions such declarations are received under certain conditions.

It has been generally held that dying declarations are not admissible in civil cases.[12] However, in certain jurisdictions dying declarations are, under certain conditions, admissible in civil cases,[13] and in some of the jurisdictions such declarations are permitted in evidence as a result of statutory regulation.[14] Where such declarations are admitted, they are received generally on the theory that the conscious danger of impending death is equivalent to the sanction of an oath.[15]

In any event, a dying declaration is not competent evidence when, tested by the standards of legal evidence, its substance is found to be incompetent.[16]

Conditions of admission. In those jurisdictions in which dying declarations are admissible, there are certain conditions on which such admissibility depends.[17] Thus it is essential that death be imminent,[18] and that declarant be conscious of that fact;[19] that, where there is a statute, the preliminary facts which bring the declaration within its scope be made to appear;[20] that the declaration relate to the facts or circumstances pertaining to the

In proceedings under workmen's compensation act for death of employee, dying declarations of the employee as to the cause of the fire which caused his death were held not admissible, dying declarations not being admissible in a civil action.—Milne v. Sanders, 228 S.W. 702, 143 Tenn. 602.

In Nebraska

(1) The rule stated in the text has been held to prevail in a case in which the declarations would have been inadmissible even as dying declarations, since death was not imminent and the declarations were not made in expectation of impending death.—Tongue v. Perrigo, 265 N.W. 737, 130 Neb. 564.

(2) However, the principle restricting competency of dying declarations to homicide cases had previously been modified so as to make dying declarations admissible in a statutory proceeding to secure revocation of the license of a physician for participation in a criminal abortion.—State ex rel. Sorensen v. Lake, 236 N.W. 762, 121 Neb. 331.

(3) Further, it had been intimated, in a case in which the declaration was admitted as part of the res gestæ, that the modification might well be extended to proceedings under workmen's compensation act.—Ridenour v. Lewis, 238 N.W. 745, 121 Neb. 823.

C. INDEPENDENTLY RELEVANT STATEMENTS

1. In General

§ 239. In General

Where the fact that a particular statement was made is of itself a relevant fact, regardless of the truth or falsity of such statement, the statement is admissible in evidence as an independently relevant fact.

Where, regardless of the truth or the falsity of a statement, the fact that it has been made is relevant, the hearsay rule does not apply, but the statement may be shown.[25] Evidence as to the making of such statement is not secondary but primary,[26] for the statement itself may constitute a fact in issue, or be circumstantially relevant as to the existence of such a fact.[27] Such statements are not regarded as evidence of the facts asserted by declarant,[28] although in many instances, as for example in direct statements as to the existence of a bodily condition,[29] or mental state,[30] it is doubtful if this rule is strictly followed. Unless so affected by suspicion as to be irrelevant,[31] statements are competent in favor of declarant.[32] The statement need not be contemporaneous with the fact in issue, but unless the court deems it too remote to be

Accounting for fact or act
When a relevant fact or act is to be accounted for, a conversation had by one of the litigating parties with a third person, in the absence of the other, may account for it, or serve as a link in the chain of explanation; and, if so, it is admissible.—Brown v. Matthews, 4 S.E. 13, 79 Ga. 1.

Irrelevant declarations are inadmissible.—Brown's Adm'r v. Wilson, 1 S.W.2d 767, 222 Ky. 454.

Particular evidence held admissible
(1) In attorney's action against property owner for services rendered in procuring increase of condemnation award against city, mayor's testimony as to conversations with attorney, to establish that attorney performed services.—Graeser v. Jones, 251 N.W. 162, 217 Iowa 499.

relevant, it may either precede[33] or follow[34] the time at which the existence of the fact sought to be proved is material. It is wholly immaterial whether such declarations were made in the presence of an adverse party to the litigation or not,[35] or what the character of the litigation is.[36] Narrative statements are, however, excluded under the rule which prevents a party from using declarations independently relevant as evidence of the facts alleged in them.[37]

Death of declarant. The fact that declarant is dead at the time of the trial does not render an otherwise relevant declaration inadmissible,[38] and his executors may be entitled to the benefit of it, even though the declaration was in his favor.[39]

Hearsay evidence of the making of a statement which is independently relevant cannot be received.[40]

§ 240. Form of Statement

An independently relevant declaration may be either oral or written.

An unsworn statement independently relevant may be oral,[41] or may appear in various written forms,[42] such as book entries,[43] letters,[44] telegrams,[45] memoranda,[46] newspaper[47] and other[48] notices, pleadings,[49] promissory notes,[50] mortgages,[51] receipts,[52] bills of lading,[53] and records.[54]

§ 241. Basis of Opinion Generally

Statements to a witness which form the basis of an opinion, testified to by him, are admissible.

Where opinion evidence is received, statements made to the witness, and on which his opinion is based, in whole or in part, may be shown.[55] Accordingly, a physician may testify as to statements made to him by the person whose bodily condition is relevant, made for the purpose of securing diagnosis and treatment, not to establish the truth of the facts stated, but to show the basis of his opinion as to the nature and extent of the disease or injury.[56] It has also been held that a physician who examined plaintiff for the purpose of qualifying himself as a witness may testify to statements made by plaintiff during the examination as to subjective symptoms,[57] or even as to his previous condition and past suffering, when declared by the expert to be necessary to enable him to form an opinion as to the nature and extent of the disease or injury,[58] to show on what information he based his opinion.

§ 242. Bodily Condition

Statements of a person which are fairly indicative of the existence of a relevant bodily condition of the declarant at the time are admissible.

As a general rule, statements which are fairly indicative of the existence of a relevant bodily condition of declarant at the time of the declaration[59] will be received as circumstantial evidence of the existence of that condition,[60] even though made a considerable time after the injury from which the condition is claimed to have resulted was received.[61] The length of the interval will, however, affect the weight of the evidence,[62] because statements made immediately or soon after the injury was received are less subject to a suspicion of fabrication than statements made a considerable time thereafter.[63] Such statements gain in probative force in proportion as they are involuntary[64] and ante litem motam,[65] and exclude the suspicion of being in whole or in part feigned.[66] Indeed, it is generally held,

Necessity of stating facts on which medical expert's opinion is based see infra § 536.

In response to defendant's examination

In personal injury action, where defendant on direct examination of a physician who was not plaintiff's regular physician had included history of plaintiff's injuries as given by plaintiff as part of premise for hypothetical question on which physician gave his opinion, plaintiff's counsel was properly permitted to elicit what her complaints were on which he based his opinion.—City of Maryville v. except perhaps in case of statements made to physicians, see infra § 246, that the statements, to be admissible, must be made under circumstances warranting the inference that they were made spontaneously, and not with a view to their effect on the controversy.[67] It is not, however, necessary that the statement should be a part of the res gestæ of the happening of the injury.[68] In the absence of a suspicion of fabrication, it is not essential that the statements should have been made ante litem motam;[69] but they have been received, although made post litem motam,[70] or even after suit has been brought,[71] or during the trial.[72]

Intoxication. The statements of a person alleged to have been intoxicated at the time are admissible to show the fact of intoxication.[73]

Insanity of the sufferer at the time of making declarations as to then existing pain does not render evidence of such declarations inadmissible.[74]

Statements of third persons. An unsworn statement of a third person cannot be direct evidence of the existence of a particular bodily condition in men[75] or in animals,[76] although declarant was intimately acquainted with the facts.[77] The fact that the declaration was made in the presence of the person to whose bodily condition it related does not render it admissible,[78] unless in the latter case his acquiescence was in the nature of an admission, in which event the statement may be used against him.[79]

§ 243. Form of Declaration in General

A declaration indicating bodily condition is generally held to be admissible whether articulate or inarticulate, although in some jurisdictions statements other than inarticulate expressions of pain are inadmissible unless made to a physician for purposes of treatment.

"The plaintiff's wife was permitted to testify to his complaints made in her hearing. She said he complained of his side a great deal, and, being told to state all of his complaints, she said his head hurt him, and his side and leg; he suffered a great deal. Such evidence as this, by a witness other than the wife of a party, was competent and admissible, so long as the law excluded parties from being witnesses in their own behalf; but now that they are, by statute, competent to testify, and where, as in this case, the testimony is heard from the plaintiff himself, who knew the facts of pain and suffering, his wife, whose knowledge of them was derived from hearsay, was not competent to prove complaints which were no part of the res gestae of the injury. The ground on which such evidence was formerly deemed competent was the ground of necessity. That necessity no longer exists. The higher and better evidence is that of the person who has actual knowledge of the truth of the pains and other feelings to which the complaints relate."—Atlanta St. R. Co. v. Walker, 21 S. Natural and instinctive expressions
(1) Unless complaints are made to a physician with the view to medical treatment, the proof should be limited to such complaints as are the natural and instinctive expressions of present sufferings. Evidence is not admissible of complaints which consist simply of answers to questions, or are merely descriptive statements or assertions of the existence of present suffering.—Martin v. Sherwood, 51 A. 526, 74 Conn. 475.

form part of the res gestæ of the accident.[87]

§ 244. Exclamations of Pain

Where relevant, exclamations of present pain are admissible.

Where the bodily condition of a person is a relevant fact, exclamations of present pain[89] or distress[90] which are shown to be the natural and spontaneous expression of present feeling and not the result of a deliberate purpose[91] are competent circumstantial evidence of the existence of the particular bodily condition, especially where there are other indications of the condition.[92] It is not necessary that the exclamations should have been contemporaneous with the injury causing the condition,[93] but such exclamations have been held admissible, even though they occurred a considerable time after the injury,[94] or after declarant had decided to bring suit therefor.[95] It is not necessary that the exact words used by the sufferer should be shown.[96]

§ 245. Narrative Statements

As a general rule mere narrative statements as to bodily condition, or the causes or effect of sickness or injury, are inadmissible.

Statements of a narrative nature as to the causes,[97] attendant circumstances,[98] or effect[99] of the sickness or injuries, or the manner in which, or the time at which, an injury was inflicted,[1] or the nature of former symptoms,[2] or past sufferings of the persons,[3] or in general, as to bodily condition at

§ 246. To Whom Made

Any competent witness may testify to a relevant declaration indicating bodily condition. Statements to a physician as to bodily condition, particularly when made for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment, are admissible.

Relevant statements as to bodily condition are competent when made in the hearing of any person, and may be proved by any competent witness.[6] Accordingly it is permissible to show statements made in the hearing of a nurse[7] or other attendant,[8] the wife,[9] husband,[10] mother[11] or father[12] of the sufferer, or even an ordinary bystander.[13]

Statements to a physician as to pain or suffering or the location and nature of symptoms, made for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment, are received as circumstantial evidence of the existence of the bodily condition stated,[14] and are entitled to more weight than similar statements made to another person.[15] Only such statements, however, as are made for the purpose of securing,[16] and which are necessary to secure,[17] proper diagnosis and treatment are admissible. Narrative statements to a physician are to be rejected where they relate to facts not connected with diagnosis and treatment,[18] such as the cause of an illness or injury,[19] the circumstanc-as to complaints of patient.—Raymond & Whitcomb Co. v. Ebsary, C.C.A.N.Y., 9 F.2d 889, reversing, D. C., Ebsary v Raymond & Whitcomb Co, 4 F.2d 285.

Complaints

Present symptoms

Descriptive statements

Mere descriptive statements of a sick or injured person as to the symptoms and effects of his malady are only admissible under the following circumstances: First, they must have been made to a medical attendant for the purpose of medical treatment; second, they must relate to existing pain or other symptoms from which the patient is suffering at the time; third, such statements are only admissible when the medical attendant is called on to give an expert opinion based in part on them.

Youth of declarant

Although statements made by a patient to his physician may be competent, on other grounds, the extreme youth of the patient does not of itself make such statements competent evidence.—Gulf Refining Co. v. Frazier, 15 Tenn.App. 662.

In mental cases

It is not competent for a medical expert on the question of insanity, in giving the reasons on which his opinion is founded, to repeat the narrations of monomaniacs as to the development of their malady, or of unprofessional nurses as to the conduct of insane persons in their care.—Wood v. Sawyer, 61 N.C. 251.

Must be res gestæ

The statements of a person to his attending physician as to the causes of his injury and the circumstances under which it occurred are not admissible, even though made for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment, unless they were made so soon after the accident and under such circumstances as to constitute part of the res gestæ.

U.S.—London Guarantee & Accident Co. v. Woelfle, C.C.A.Mo., 83 F.2d 325.

Statements of patient testified to by physician must not go into question of responsibility.—Lowery v. Jones, 121 So. 704, 219 Ala. 201, 64 A.L.R. 553.

Workmen's compensation cases

Under some statutes it is permis-

es under which an injury was received,[20] or the instrument with which it was inflicted,[21] or past sufferings of the patient.[22] Indeed, it has been indicated that statements by a patient to a physician to be admissible must relate to the present, not to the past, and that anything in the nature of a narration of past events must be excluded.[23] Where, however, a statement to a physician, although narrative in character, relates to a matter which it is necessary or proper for him to know in order that he may accurately diagnose and properly treat the case, it may be shown.[24] The basis for admission sible for the industrial commission in workmen's compensation cases to receive testimony of a physician as to what a patient told him about the cause of his injury.—Baker v. Industrial Commission of Ohio, 186 N.E. 10, 44 Ohio App. 539.

However, it has been held that evidence of declarations to a physician should be confined to involuntary expressions of present pain.—Texas of such evidence is that it is unreasonable to suppose that the patient under such circumstances would give false information.[25] A large discretion is vested in the trial court in determining the admissibility of such evidence.[26]

Expectation that physician will testify. Where statements to a physician are made, not for the purpose of diagnosis and treatment, but in order to enable him to testify as a witness, declarant's statements are usually rejected as hearsay.[27] There is, however, authority to the effect that these considerations, while going to the weight of the evidence, do not suffice to exclude statements indicative of present suffering,[28] or as to its locality,[29] especially where the declarations are of a spontaneous and involuntary character, such as exclamations, shrinking, wincing, etc.[30] It has also been held that a physician may testify to a statement or narration given by a patient in relation to his condition, symptoms, sensations, and feelings, both past and present, when such statements are necessary to enable him to give his opinion as an expert.[31] Where a physician is called in for the purpose of treating or advising as to the treatment of a sick or injured person, it is not a sufficient reason for rejecting the statements of such person to the physician that it is also anticipated that the physician may be a witness.[32]

§ 247. Claim by One in Possession

declarations are hearsay,[39] whether they relate to the general history of the declarant's possession[40] or title,[41] whether they are in favor of the declarant,[42] his privies,[43] or his representatives,[44] and even though they were made when the declarant was in articulo mortis,[45] or are offered in evidence after his death.[46]

Declarations accompanying possession, and serving to explain or give character to the same, are frequently held to be admissible as part of the res gestæ of possession,[47] and it has been said to be under the same rule that narrative declarations as to the existence of past events,[48] or statements of intention as to the future[49] are excluded.

Declaration of stranger. A declaration by a person who does not stand in any relation of privity to either party to the action is irrelevant and cannot be received.[50]

Necessity for possession. In order for a declaration to be competent it must have been made while the declarant was in possession,[51] but constructive possession is sufficient.[52] The declaration need not have accompanied or been contemporaneous with any distinct or particular act of possession,[53] nor is it necessary, in case of land, that the declarant should have been on the land when the statement was made.[54]

22 C.J. p 273 note 18.

The fact of possession must be shown by evidence apart from the declarations themselves.[55]

Character of statement. In order for a declaration by one in possession to be admissible, it must be such as to characterize his possession[56] and must be made when it is pertinent[57] and important on the question of actual ownership[58] of the property in question.[59] It must be more than a casual and conversational remark, and must be made when the person was called upon to make it, and when the truth was required to be spoken.[60] The rule admitting declarations of persons in possession of property cannot be extended to declarations touching past conversations or transactions between the parties.[61] Where it is sought to show such a declaration in order to aid the presumption of ownership from possession, the declaration must be something more than hearsay, and must give definite significance to equivocal conduct by adding a missing link.[62] Where the declaration is not limited to the claim under which or the intention with which possession is held, but involves other facts as to which it is merely hearsay, it may, in the discretion of the court, be rejected.[63]

Possession subordinate to title of another. Where the declarant in possession is a lessee,[64] or a tenant by the curtesy[65] or in dower,[66] or a cotenant,[67] or a mortgagee,[68] or one holding an option to purchase,[69] his possession may well be under his actual rights and does not in itself put the owner upon an inquiry as to the animus with which it is being held, and hence his declaration of adverse claim is not relevant, unless shown to have been brought to the attention of the owner;[70] but the statements of one in possession to the effect that he is a tenant of real[71] or personal[72] property, and as to who is the particular person under whom he claims to hold such real estate[73] or personalty,[74] and even as to what lands are embraced in the holding,[75] are competent circumstantial evidence, in favor of the person named as owner, of the existence of a relevant fact.

§ 248. Real Property in General

The rule that declarations by one in possession of property characterizing such possession are admissible has been applied in a number of situations relating to real property.

In the case of real estate, declarations by one in possession of land are competent to show that his user or possession was adverse to the title of another, see Adverse Possession § 221 b 5 (b) aa, and that the person affected by the user or possession knew of its nature;[76] to determine the territorial extent of his possession;[77] to show the intent with which the declarant made an entry on the land;[78] or to negative an intent on his part to abandon the ownership.[79] It is not ground for rejecting the declarations that they are self-serving,[80] if they are made in apparent good faith; and the benefit of them in such case inures not only to the declarant, but to those in privity with him,[81] including his representatives[82] and creditors.[83] Statements by one in possession of real property are admissible to indicate the source of the title relied on,[84] so far as that fact may have legitimate incidental bearing on the good faith and nature of the claim or its extent;[85] but generally declarations made by a person in possession of real property as to the history and source of title are inadmissible under this exception to the hearsay rule.[86] Likewise such declarations are not competent to sustain or destroy record title.[87]

Form of declaration. The declaration may be oral or in writing,[88] or even in the form of general reputation.[89]

§ 249. Declarations as to Private Boundaries

Declarations by one in possession of realty as to the boundaries of such property are admissible to show the extent of his claim; and in some jurisdictions, where the declarant has since died, his declarations while owner and in possession, made while pointing out his boundaries, are admissible as evidence of the facts as stated.

While the declaration of one in possession of premises as to the line of his boundary is not evidence that such is in fact the true line,[90] it is primary evidence of the extent of his claim in that particular,[91] provided at the time of the statement he was the owner of the land,[92] and was in actual possession thereof,[93] and, according to some authorities, provided also the declaration was made while declarant was in the act of establishing or pointing out the boundaries[94] and while he was on the land itself.[95] Such evidence is competent in behalf of those in privity with declarant.[96]

A declaration by a tenant or equitable owner as to the location of a corner or line is admissible if paper title in the landlord or trustee is shown.[97] The declarations of an agent in possession of his principal's realty, made within the scope of his agency, and while performing duties assigned him and in relation thereto, with respect to the boundaries of the premises, are admissible.[98]

Death of declarant. An anomalous rule as to declarations concerning private boundaries, presenting certain features of both the rule under consideration and that regulating the admissibility of declarations of deceased persons generally as to matters of private boundaries, see supra §§ 234–237, is followed in some jurisdictions, to the effect that declarations of a deceased owner or tenant, in possession of lands and on the premises, made while in the act of pointing out his own boundaries, and their marks, are competent evidence,[99] not only of declarant's claim as to the extent of his possession, but of the fact that the boundaries and landmarks are as stated, provided there is no interest to misrepresent,[1] and provided further declarant had adequate means of knowledge.[2] If declarant never occupied the land to which his declaration relates, as owner[3] or otherwise,[4] or had ceased to do so at the time of the declaration,[5] or if the declaration was made in any other connection than that of pointing out boundaries,[6] or if declarant is not shown to be dead,[7] the declaration is inadmissible.

§ 250. Personal Property

The declarations of one in possession of personal property which characterize his possession are admissible.

The existence and extent of a claim of one in possession of personal property as to the ownership thereof or rights therein may be shown by his relevant declarations,[8] although they operate in declar-

Offer to sell

In replevin for cattle seized under an execution against plaintiff's husband, testimony that the husband had offered to sell witness some of the cattle was not incompetent when taken in connection with other evidence tending to show that plaintiff permitted her husband to use the property as his own.—Mitchell v. Smith, 111 S.W. 806, 86 Ark. 486.

ant's own favor.[9] Such declarations, to be admissible, must accompany the possession and must be made where the nature of the possession is the subject of inquiry, and must concern the title or explain the character of the possession. They must not go beyond this.[10] Such statements are not evidence of the truth of the facts stated or the validity of the claim asserted.[11] Declarant must have been in possession at the time of making the declaration,[12] and declarations made during the pendency of the litigation have been rejected.[13]

Explanation of possession. The declarations of persons in possession of personal property, explanatory of the character of their possession are competent.[14]

§ 251. Effect of Observation

Declarations which are fairly indicative of the effect on the declarant of observed appearances, conduct, or sensations are admissible.

Exclamations and other relevant unsworn statements are competent circumstantial evidence where they fairly indicate the effect on declarant of observed appearances,[15] conduct,[16] or sensations.[17] Declarations of opinion based on observation are not within the rule.[18]

§ 252. Fraud and Good Faith

Where relevant, declarations tending to show fraud or good faith may be admissible.

An unsworn statement may furnish circumstantial evidence of fraud[19] or good faith.[20] The only limit which can be fixed to the range of such statements is that of relevancy;[21] but it is of course necessary that the fact sought to be proved should itself be relevant.[22]

An unsworn statement may be admitted for the purpose of identifying a date,[23] a payment,[24] a person[25] or a place,[26] and, likewise, may be admitted to identify property, real[27] or personal,[28] or a transaction,[29] provided the fact of identity is shown to be in issue or relevant to the issue,[30] and no better or more conclusive evidence on the subject can be produced.[31] On the other hand, statements as to identity of persons[32] or things,[33] which are not of such a character as to come within the exception to the hearsay rule as independently relevant statements, see supra § 239, are inadmissible.

§ 254. Mental Condition

Where relevant, declarations of a person are admissible to show his mental condition.

Statements by a person which indicate a certain mental condition of declarant may be received as circumstantial evidence that such condition existed,[34] although they are not competent as direct evidence of the facts asserted.[35] Such declarations are competent, not only when made at the time at which the mental condition of declarant is relevant,[36] but also when they were made before[37] or after[38] such time, provided the statement is not too remote.[39]

Mental condition of another. A statement by a person not called as a witness, as to the mental condition of another person, is hearsay and inadmissible,[40] even though declarant occupied a close family[41] or professional[42] relationship to the person spoken of.

Capacity for resistance to suggestions. The mental strength of a person may be a fact of great importance in estimating the effect of pressure on him in the form of fraud[43] or undue influence;[44] in which cases much assistance is gained by considering the declarations of the person in question,[45] whether they be oral[46] or written, as in the case of letters[47] or diaries.[48]

Mental weakness and insanity. Declarations of a person are admissible as evidence of weakness of his mental faculties,[49] or of his insanity,[50] provided of course they are of such character as to indicate the existence of such conditions.[51]

Power of memory. Declarations involving the use of memory are admissible as evidence of declarant's ability to recollect,[52] or to show failure or impairment of his memory.[53]

§ 255. Mental State

Statements tending to show a person's state of mind, if relevant to the issues, are admissible.

Where the existence of a particular mental state in a particular individual is a relevant fact,[54] his declarations which indicate the existence or nonexistence of such state are admitted as circumstantial evidence,[55] even though the declarant himself may be available as a witness.[56] Although in some instances the res gestæ doctrine and this exception to the hearsay rule coincide and serve equally to admit the statement in question,[57] the two rules are nevertheless wholly distinct in their nature and in

"The rule is without exception so far as occurs to us at the moment, that whenever the intention, feeling, belief, or other mental state of a person at a particular time, including his bodily feeling, is material to an issue under trial, evidence of such person's declarations at the time, indicative of his then mental state, are admissible in evidence. It is wholly immaterial whether such declarations were made in the presence of an adverse party to the litigation or not, or what the character of the litigation is. The sole tests are, Is the intention, belief, or other mental state of the declarant at the time material to the issues under trial, and does the declaration indicate what the declarant's intention, belief, or other mental state at the time was?"—In re Carson's Estate, 194 P. 5, 9, 184 Cal. 437, 17 A.L.R. 239.

The effect of a certain influence on the mind of the declarant may be shown by his statements.[59]

The rule as to declarations disclosing the mental state of the declarant applies to declarations made at the time at which such mental state is relevant,[60] and is also extended to declarations made prior[61] and subsequent[62] to such time, provided, of course, such declarations are not too remote. Such declarations may be admissible even though they were made after the suit was instituted, if the mental state of declarant at that time is relevant.[63]

Of course, declarations tending to show the state of mind of another are hearsay and are inadmissible.[64]

Narrative statement. A narrative statement of the existence of a past state of feeling on the part of the declarant is not admissible,[65] especially where it is self-serving[66] and made post litem motam.[67] Where, however, the statement, although narrative, amounts to an admission, it is competent against the declarant.[68]

Particular states of mind. The fact that a person's mental state at a given time was one of assent may be shown by proving his statement indicative of such a feeling;[69] and, conversely, a person's dissent may be shown by his relevant declarations.[70]

The belief of a person, when it is a relevant fact, may be proved circumstantially by his declarations;[71] and statements brought to his attention may be independently relevant as showing the grounds of belief.[72]

Whether a person is acting under constraint may be shown by his relevant declarations.[73]

A person's mental state of fear is provable by his declarations unless they are too remote.[74]

Declarations of a person are competent to show the friendly nature of his feelings toward another,[75] provided the state of the declarant's mind is relevant to the inquiry.[76] Of course, such declarations are not competent to establish the truth of facts directly asserted therein.[77] On the other hand, where declarant's ill will toward a person relates directly to the issues of a case, his declarations showing the existence of such ill will are admissible.[78]

Declarations in pais may be admissible as tending to show that the mental state of the declarant is one of indifference.[79]

In presence of beneficiary

Declarations of parent, making advancements to child which are contemporaneous with gifts, or subsequent verbal declarations by him to or the delivery of a deed;[3] or to show intention of a husband to desert his wife and family.[4] A declaration indicating a present intention to do a particular act in the immediate future, made in apparent good faith and not for self-serving purposes, is admissible to prove that the act was in fact performed.[5] Evidence of declarations by an insured when he left home, of the purpose of his trip, and when he would return, is admissible as bearing on the presumption of death arising from absence;[6] but it has also been held that a letter deliberately prepared by an insured was not admissible under such circumstances as showing his mental condition at the time and his feeling and mental attitude toward his family.[7]

Time of declaration. A declaration of intent or intention is not necessarily admissible because made contemporaneously with relevant acts; existence of the particular mental state at that time must itself be a relevant fact.[8] On the other hand, no requirement exists that the making of a declaration indicating intent or intention should be contemporaneous with the time when its existence is relevant, but the test is logic rather than time, and, within limits prescribed by the rules as to remoteness,[9] prior[10] or subsequent,[11] as well as accompanying,[12] statements are competent.

Death of declarant. An otherwise relevant declaration is not rendered incompetent by reason of the fact that the declarant is dead.[13] It has also been declared that such a declaration, to be admissible, must appear to have been made in a natural manner, and not under circumstances of suspicion.[14]

Declarations favorable to declarant. If a declaration of intent or intention is relevant, the declarant is entitled to the benefit of it, even though it be in his favor.[15]

§ 257. Knowledge

The existence or absence of knowledge, where relevant, may be shown by a person's declarations and statements to a person whose knowledge is relevant are admissible. General knowledge may also be shown as bearing on a person's knowledge.

The existence[16] of knowledge may be shown, or child and not controverted by latter, are admissible in subsequent suit for partition among devisees, but mere declarations of father made in son's absence are not provable.—Alward v. Woodard, 146 N.E. 154, 315 Ill. 150.

Declaration of widow was inadmissible as against son in determining whether property deeded son by father was advancement.—Pilkington v. Wheat, 51 S.W.2d 42, 330 Mo. 767, transferred, see App., 35 S.W.2d 666.

Kresge Co., App., 85 S.W.2d 157, 159, quoting Corpus Juris, quashed on the ground that only part of the statements were admissible to prove knowledge, the balance being the absence[17] of knowledge may be shown by declarations of the person whose knowledge is of importance, even though such declarations were made a considerable time before or after the time involved in the inquiry, provided there is not such an element of remoteness as destroys materiality.[18]

Where a person's knowledge of a particular fact is relevant, it may be shown that an unsworn statement of another person as to its existence was brought to his attention in the same way that any other relevant statement may be shown to have been made to him.[19] It is accordingly permissible to show direct and specific statements, such as advice,[20] information,[21] instructions,[22] notices,[23] representations,[24] or threats.[25] The evidence offered must in all cases have a logical tendency to establish the fact of knowledge,[26] but, provided the time is not too remote, statements made to a person whose knowledge is relevant may be shown, although made a considerable time before the time when such knowledge is relevant.[27]

General knowledge. As bearing on whether a particular person had knowledge of a certain fact it is competent to show general notoriety,[28] general knowledge,[29] or reputation[30] in the community of which such person is a member, provided such notoriety or reputation is established to such an extent as to raise a reasonable inference that the fact was known to the person in question.[31] It has also been held that newspaper[32] or other[33] publication of a fact raises an inference that a person likely to have learned of the statement[34] did so learn.
